25TH CONGRESS, 3D SESSION.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1838.

VOL. 7...No. 1.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 3, 1838.

At twelve o'clock, the Senate was called to order by Hon. W. R. KING, of Alabama, President pro tempore, when the following Senators appeared in their seats:

Messrs. WILLIAMS and RUGLES, of Maine; Messrs. HAYARD and PIERCE, of New Hampshire; Messrs. PRENTISS and SWIFT, of Vermont; Messrs. NILES and SMITH, of Connecticut; Messrs. ROANE and RIVES, of Virginia; Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts; Mr. WRIGHT, of New York; Mr. WALL, of New Jersey; Messrs. BUCHANAN and MCKEAN, of Pennsylvania; Messrs. BAYARD and CLAYTON, of Delaware; Mr. MERRICK, of Maryland; Messrs. ROANE and RIVES, of Virginia; Mr. STRANGE, of North Carolina; Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina; Mr. LUMPKIN, of Georgia; Mr. KING, of Alabama; Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky; Messrs. MORRIS and ALLEN, of Ohio; Messrs. TIPTON and SMITH, of Indiana; Messrs. ROBINSON and YOUNG, of Illinois; Mr. FULTON, of Arkansas; and Mr. NORVELL, of Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. EPHRAIM H. FOSTER, appointed by the Governor of the State of Tennessee a Senator from that State to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. FELIX GRUNDY.

The usual oath was then administered to Mr. FOSTER by the President, and he took his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. MORRIS, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate had assembled, and were ready to proceed to business.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that quorums of the two Houses had assembled, and were ready to receive any communications he might make.

Whereupon Messrs. WRIGHT and ALLEN were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate by the President.

On motion by Mr. MCKEAN, the usual order was taken for the supply of the Senators with newspapers during the session.

On motion by Mr. MORRIS, it was Ordered, That the hour of meeting be at 12 m., until otherwise directed.

On motion by Mr. MORRIS, the Senate then adjourned.

IOWA TERRITORY.

W. W. Chapman.

The following gentlemen appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

Messrs. BEERS and PUTNAM of New York, GIDDINGS and SWEARINGEN of Ohio, and CRABB of Alabama.

WISCONSIN ELECTION.

Mr. CRARY announced the Chair that Hon. J. W. Doty was in attendance as a Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, and moved that he be qualified.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, then rose and protested against the right of Mr. Doty to take his seat in violation of Mr. J.'s rights as the sitting member, no vacancy having occurred, and he having never resigned.

The SPEAKER said it was a question for the House to take its order upon.

Mr. CRARY produced the certificate of Mr. Doty's election from Governor Dodge; which was read.

Mr. KEIM moved to lay Mr. CRARY's motion on the table, but,

On motion of Mr. MERCER, the further consideration of the subject was postponed till Thursday next.

ELECTION OF CLERK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Chief Clerk, notifying the House of the death of Colonel Walter S. Franklin, late Clerk to the House of Representatives; which was read.

Mr. PETRIKIN then submitted a resolution authorizing the present assistant clerk to act as Clerk of the House until the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Franklin should be filled.

Mr. MILLIGAN moved to amend by substituting a resolution for the House to proceed forthwith to elect a Clerk.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved an amendment so as to provide that the election should be  viva voce.

Mr. MILLIGAN inquired if this motion was in order?

The SPEAKER ruled it to be so.

Mr. ADAMS further asked if it did not conflict with that rule of the House which provided that officers of the House should be elected by ballot?

The SPEAKER remarked that there was no such rule; the only one having reference to that point merely providing what shall be done in cases of election by ballot.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 119, nays 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Clark, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Edwards, Elmore, Ewing, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grantland, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, James Y. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Menefee, Mitchell, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrik, Phelps, Plumer, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Rariden, Reilly, Rhett, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—119.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayerigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Childs, Clowney, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKenna, Mercer, Milligan, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Randolph, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—91.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the question recurring on the latter as amended—

Mr. THOMAS remarked, substantially, that, though he had voted for the amendment, and Mr. MILLIGAN's proposition had been thereby made more acceptable to him, yet he was not prepared to vote for it at this time. There were several candidates, if he had not been misinformed; and it was barely possible that their merits could yet have been sufficiently canvassed. He thought it better, therefore, to postpone the election for a day or two, and in the interim employ the assistant clerk. Moreover, there was little probability that the election would be closed to day, perhaps not to-morrow, and hence the annual message of the President would be prevented from going forth to the country at the usual time.

After some further remarks, indistinctly heard at the reporter's desk—

Mr. T. concluded by saying that he was prepared to sustain a general proposition that all cases of election by that House should be viva voce.

Mr. PEARCE expressed a wish that the House would proceed forthwith.

The House was then divided on Mr. MILLIGAN's amendment; and it being agreed to—yes 102, noes 101—the resolution, as thus amended, was also agreed to—yes 104, noes 96.

So the House determined to proceed with the election of a Clerk forthwith, viva voce.

The following nominations were then made: Mr. BRONSON nominated Edward Livingston, of New York.

Mr. CORWIN nominated M. St. Clair Clarke, of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DROMGOOLE nominated Hugh A. Garland, of Virginia.

Mr. SERGEANT nominated Samuel Shock, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLIGAN nominated Arnold Naudain, of Delaware.

Mr. WAGENER nominated Henry Buehler, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANEY nominated John Bigler, of Ohio.

Mr. POPE nominated James H. Burch, of Missouri.

FIRST VOTE.

For James Burch—Messrs. Crockett, Halsted, Herod, Menefee, Rumsey, Southgate, Underwood, Albert S. White, and Christopher H. Williams—9.

For John Bigler—Messrs. Chaney, Cushman, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Leadbetter, Shepler, Swearingen, and Webster—8.

For R. M. Whitney—Messrs. Clark and Edwards—2.

Whole number of votes, 210; necessary to a choice, 106.

Neither of the candidates having a majority of the whole number of votes cast, a second call was ordered.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved that the House adjourn; which was not agreed to.

SECOND VOTE.

For M. St. C. Clarke—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayerigg, Bell, Bond, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Clowney, Coffin, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Hoffman, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, Menefee, Mercer, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Randolph, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—88.

For Hugh A. Garland—Messrs. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Bouldin, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, Dromgoole, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Glascock, Grantland, Haley, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Lewis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Montgomery, Morgan, Murray, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Petrik, Phillips, Rhett, Rives, Sawyer, Snyder, Stuart, Thomas, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Wills, Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, and Worthington—59.

For Edward Livingston—Messrs. Andrews, Beers, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Bronson, De Graff, Edwards, Gallup, Bird, Gray, Thomas B. Jackson, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, Loomis, Robert McClellan, Moore, Noble, Palmer, Pratt, Prentiss, Spencer, Taylor, Titus, Vail, and Vanderveer—26.

For Samuel Shock—Messrs. Biddle, Borden, Darlington, Davis, Henry, Marvin, McKenna, Mitchell, Potts, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, and Christopher H. Williams—13.

For Henry Buehler—Messrs. Beatty, Buchanan, Hammond, Hubley, Keim, Klingensmith, Logan, Samuel W. Morris, Paynter, Plumer, Reilly, Wagener, and Sheffer—13.

For J. Bigler—Messrs. Chaney, Isaac Fletcher, Leadbetter, Shepler, Swearingen, and Webster—6.

For Arnold Naudain—Messrs. Herod, Milligan, Rencher, and Taliaferro—4.

Whole number of votes, 209; necessary to a choice, 105.

Mr. THOMAS rose for the purpose of moving that the Speaker be empowered to vote, and submitted an amendment to the standing order to that effect.

Mr. WISE insisted that the motion was not in order, and the Chair so ruling, the motion was not entertained.

Mr. TOUCEY moved that the House adjourn. Lost—92 to 110.

THIRD VOTE.

The names of Messrs. Bigler, Livingston, Buehler, Naudain, and Shock, were then severally withdrawn by the gentlemen who nomiinated them, and the House voting a third time, the result was announced to be as follows:

For Hugh A. Garland—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clowney, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Grantland, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Thomas B. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrik, Phelps, Plumer, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reilly, Rhett, Rives, Sawyer, Sheffer, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, and Worthington—106.

For M. St. C. Clarke—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayerigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKenna, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—104.

Whole number of votes, 210. Necessary to a choice, 106.

So HUGH A. GARLAND having received a majority of the votes, was declared to be duly elected Clerk to the House for the residue of the present Congress.

Mr. HAYNES moved to take up the usual message from the Senate; but the motion was set aside by a conversation on the order of business.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the daily hour of meeting was ordered to be twelve o'clock, m. till otherwise directed.

On motion of Mr. WISE, the House adjourned at half past three, p. m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 4, 1838.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, appeared in his place. A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GARLAND, their Clerk, stating that the House was organized and ready to proceed to business.

Also, that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate, appointing a joint committee to wait upon the President of the United States, informing him that the two Houses were organized and ready to receive any communication he might make.

And that the House had appointed as said committee on their part, Messrs. CAMBRELENG, LINCOLN, and CONNOR.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. KNIGHT gave notice that, on to-morrow, he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Sarah Angel and the other heirs of Benjamin King, deceased. Also, a bill to allow a drawback on imported hemp when manufactured into cordage and exported.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, gave notice that on to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

PETITION.

Mr. RIVES presented the petition of James Barron, a captain in the Navy of the United States, praying that a law may be passed providing for a settlement of his accounts on the principles of equity; laid on the table.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BAYARD moved that, by unanimous consent, the appointment of the standing committees be made by the Chair. This, he observed, was done at the last session to avoid the delay attending the numerous ballotings; and, as no material change had taken place in the body since the last session, he thought it would be advisable to adopt the same course at the present session.

Mr. HUBBARD was in favor of the motion, but did not wish it acted on for the present, inasmuch as several Senators were absent who might be excluded. No inconvenience, he observed, would result from the delay of a day or two; and he hoped the gentleman would consent to suspend his motion for that time.

Mr. BAYARD said that if the motion prevailed, the Chair would necessarily take two or three days time to appoint the committees in, and thus the objection of the Senator, with respect to the absence of members, would be obviated. He found by the Journal that at the last session the appointment of the standing committees was vested in the Chair, on the motion of Mr. GRAYSON; and as the complexion of the body was nearly the same at this session, he thought the same convenience would result from pursuing a similar course now.

Mr. HUBBARD observed that, if the order was now passed vesting the appointment of the standing committees in the Chair, the gentleman would find them announced when the Journal was read to-morrow. He did not know whether the absent Senators would be excluded or not, but under the impression that they would be, he would move, if the gentleman pressed his motion, to lay it on the table. He hoped, however, the gentleman would not press it.

Mr. BAYARD said, certainly not. The motion, if adopted, must be adopted unanimously, and the intimation of the gentleman that he wished it delayed for the present, was sufficient to induce him to withdraw it.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that quorums of the two Houses of Congress had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication he might make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and had received for answer that the President would immediately make a communication to Congress in writing.

A message was then received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MARTIN VAN BUREN, jr., his Private Secretary, as follows:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate

and House of Representatives:

I congratulate you on the favorable circumstances in the condition of our country, under which you reassemble for the performance of your official duties. Though the anticipations of an abundant harvest have not everywhere been realized, yet, on the whole, the labors of the husbandman are rewarded with a bountiful return; industry prospers in its various channels of business and enterprise; general health again prevails through our vast diversity of climate; nothing threatens, from abroad, the continuance of external peace; nor has anything at home impaired the strength of those fraternal and domestic ties which constitute the only guarantee to the success and permanency of our happy Union, and which, formed in the hour of peril, have hitherto been honorably sustained through every vicissitude in our national affairs. These blessings, which evince the care and beneficence of Providence, call for our devout and fervent gratitude.

We have not less reason to be grateful for other bounties bestowed by the same munificent hand, and more exclusively our own.

The present year closes the first half century of our Federal institutions; and our system—differing from all others in the acknowledged, practical, and unlimited operation which it has for so long a period given to the sovereignty of the people—has now been fully tested by experience.

The Constitution devised by our forefathers as the framework and bond of that system, then untried, has become a settled form of Government; not only preserving and protecting the great principles upon which it was founded, but wonderfully promoting individual happiness and private interests. Though subject to change and entire revocation, whenever deemed inadequate to all these purposes, yet such is the wisdom of its construction, and so stable has been the public sentiment, that it remains unaltered, except in matters of detail, comparatively unimportant. It has proved amply sufficient for the various emergencies incident to our condition as a nation. A formidable foreign war; agitating collisions between domestic, and, in some respects, rival sovereignties; temptations to interfere in the intestine commotions of neighboring countries; the dangerous influences that arise in periods of excessive prosperity; and the anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth—these, with other trials not less formidable, have all been encountered, and thus far successfully resisted.

It was reserved for the American Union to test the advantages of a government entirely dependent on the continual exercise of the popular will; and our experience has shown that it is as beneficent in practice as it is just in theory. Each successive change made in our local institutions has contributed to extend the right of suffrage, has increased the direct influence of the mass of the community, given greater freedom to individual exertion, and restricted, more and more, the powers of Government; yet the intelligence, prudence, and patriotism of the people have kept pace with this augmented responsibility. In no country has education been so widely diffused. Domestic peace has nowhere so largely reigned. The close bonds of social intercourse have in no instance prevailed with such harmony over a space so vast. All forms of religion have united, for the first time, to diffuse charity and piety, because, for the first time in the history of nations, all have been totally untrammelled and absolutely free. The deepest recesses of the wilderness have been penetrated; yet, instead of the rudeness in the social condition consequent upon such adventures elsewhere, numerous communities have sprung up, already unrivaled in prosperity, general intelligence, internal tranquillity, and the wisdom of their political institutions. Internal improvement, the fruit of individual enterprise, fostered by the protection of the States, has added new links to the Confederation, and fresh rewards to provident industry. Doubtful questions of domestic policy have been quietly settled by mutual forbearance; and agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, minister to each other. Taxation and public debt, the burdens which bear so heavily upon all other countries, have pressed with comparative lightness upon us. Without one entangling alliance, our friendship is prized by every nation; and the rights of our citizens are everywhere respected, because they are known to be guarded by a united, sensitive, and watchful people.

To this practical operation of our institutions, so evident and successful, we owe that increased attachment to them which is among the most cheering exhibitions of popular sentiment, and will prove their best security, in time to come, against foreign or domestic assault.

This review of the results of our institutions, for half a century, without exciting a spirit of vain exultation, should serve to impress upon us the great principles from which they have sprung; constant and direct supervision by the people over every public measure; strict forbearance on the part of the Government from exercising any doubtful or disputed powers; and a cautious abstinence from all interference with concerns which properly belong, and are best left, to State regulations and individual enterprise.

Full information of the state of our foreign affairs having been recently, on different occasions, submitted to Congress, I deem it necessary now to bring to your notice only such events as have subsequently occurred, or are of such importance as to require particular attention.

The most amicable dispositions continue to be exhibited by all the nations with whom the Government and citizens of the United States have an habitual intercourse. At the date of my last annual message, Mexico was the only nation which could not be included in so gratifying a reference to our foreign relations.

I am happy to be now able to inform you that an advance has been made towards the adjustment of our difficulties with that Republic, and the restoration of the customary good feeling between the two nations. This important change has been effected by conciliatory negotiations, that have resulted in the conclusion of a treaty between the two Governments, which, when ratified, will refer to the arbitration of a friendly Power, all the subjects of controversy between us growing out of injuries to individuals. There is, at present, also, reason to believe that an equitable settlement of all disputed points will be obtained without further difficulty or unnecessary delay; and thus authorize the free resumption of diplomatic intercourse with our sister Republic.

With respect to the northeastern boundary of the United States, no official correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain has passed since that communicated to Congress towards the close of their last session. The offer to negotiate a convention for the appointment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, I am, however, assured will be met by her Majesty's Government in a conciliatory and friendly spirit, and instructions to enable the British Minister here to conclude such an arrangement will be transmitted to him without needless delay. It is hoped and expected that these instructions will be of a liberal character, and that this negotiation, if successful, will prove to be an important step towards the satisfactory and final adjustment of the controversy.

I had hoped that the respect for the laws and regard for the peace and honor of their own country, which has ever characterized the citizens of the United States, would have prevented any portion of them from using any means to promote insurrection in the territory of a Power with which we are at peace, and with which the United States are desirous of maintaining the most friendly relations. I regret deeply, however, to be obliged to inform you that this has not been the case. Information has been given to me, derived from official and other sources, that many citizens of the United States have associated together to make hostile incursions from our territory into Canada, and to aid and abet insurrection there, in violation of the obligations and laws of the United States, and in open disregard of their own duties as citizens. This information has been in part confirmed, by a hostile invasion actually made by citizens of the United States, in conjunction with Canadians and others, and accompanied by a forcible seizure of the property of our citizens, and an application thereof to the prosecution of military operations against the authorities and people of Canada.

The results of these criminal assaults upon the peace and order of a neighboring country have been, as was to be expected, fatally destructive to the misguided or deluded persons engaged in them, and highly injurious to those in whose behalf they are professed to have been undertaken. The authorities in Canada, from intelligence received of such intended movements among our citizens, have felt themselves obliged to take precautionary measures against them; have actually embodied the militia, and assumed an attitude to repel the invasion to which they believed the colonies were exposed from the United States. A state of feeling on both sides of the frontier has thus been produced, which called for prompt and vigorous interference. If an insurrection existed in Canada, the amicable dispositions of the United States towards Great Britain, as well as their duty to themselves, would lead them to maintain a strict neutrality, and to restrain their citizens from all violations of the laws which have been passed for its enforcement. But this Government recognizes a still higher obligation to repress all attempts on the part of its citizens to disturb the peace of a country where order prevails, or has been reestablished. Depredations by our citizens, upon nations at peace with the United States, or combinations for committing them, have at all times been regarded by the American Government and people with the greatest abhorrence. Military incursions by our citizens into countries so situated, and the commission of acts of violence on the members thereof, in order to effect a change in its government, or under any pretext whatever, have, from the commencement of our Government, been held equally criminal on the part of those engaged in them, and as much deserving of punishment as would be the disturbance of the public peace by the perpetration of similar acts within our own territory.

By no country or persons have these invaluable principles of international law—principles, the strict observance of which is so indispensable to the preservation of social order in the world—been more earnestly cherished or sacredly respected than by those great and good men who first declared, and finally established, the independence of our own country. They promulgated and maintained them at an early and critical period in our history; they were subsequently embodied in legislative enactments of a highly penal character, the faithful enforcement of which has hitherto been, and will, I trust, always continue to be, regarded as a duty inseparably associated with the maintenance of our national honor. That the people of the United States should feel an interest in the spread of political institutions as free as they regard their own to be, is natural, nor can a sincere solicitude for the success of all those who are, at any time, in good faith struggling for their acquisition, be imputed to our citizens as a crime. With the entire freedom of opinion, and an undisguised expression thereof, on their part, the Government has neither the right, nor, I trust, the disposition to interfere. But whether the interest or the honor of the United States require that they should be made a party to any such struggle, and, by inevitable consequence, to the war which is waged in its support, is a question which, by our Constitution, is wisely left to Congress alone to decide. It is, by the laws, already made criminal in our citizens to embarrass or anticipate that decision by unauthorized military operations on their part. Offenses of this character, in addition to their criminality as violations of the laws of our country, have a direct tendency to draw down upon our own citizens at large the multiplied evils of a foreign war, and expose to injurious imputations the good faith and honor of the country. As such they deserve to be put down with promptitude and decision. I cannot be mistaken, I am confident, in counting on the cordial and general concurrence of our fellow-citizens in this sentiment. A copy of the proclamation which I have felt it my duty to issue, is herewith communicated. I cannot but hope that the good sense and patriotism, the regard for the honor and reputation of their country, the respect for the laws which they have themselves enacted for their own government, and the love of order for which the mass of our people have been so long and so justly distinguished, will deter the comparatively few who are engaged in them from a further prosecution of such desperate enterprises. In the mean time, the existing laws have been, and will continue to be, faithfully executed; and every effort will be made to carry them out in their full extent. Whether they are sufficient, or not, to meet the actual state of things on the Canadian frontier, it is for Congress to decide.

It will appear from the correspondence herewith submitted, that the Government of Russia declines a renewal of the fourth article of the convention of April, 1824, between the United States and his Imperial Majesty, by the third article of which it is agreed that "hereafter there shall not be formed by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of the said States, any establishment upon the northwest coast of America, nor in any of the islands adjacent, to the north of 54° 40' of north latitude; and that in the same manner there shall be none formed by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, south of the same parallel;" and by the fourth article, "that, during a term of ten years, counting from the signature of the present convention, the ships of both Powers, or which belong to their citizens or subjects respectively, may reciprocally frequent without any hinderance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the coast mentioned in the preceding article, for the purpose of fishing and trading with the natives of the country." The reasons assigned for declining to renew the provisions of this article, are, briefly, that the only use made by our citizens of the privilege it secures to them, has been to supply the Indians with spirituous liquors, ammunition, and fire-arms; that this traffic has been excluded from the Russian trade; and as the supplies furnished from the United States are injurious to the Russian establishments on the northwest coast, and calculated to produce complaints between the two Governments, his Imperial Majesty thinks it for the interest of both countries not to accede to the proposition made by the American Government for the renewal of the article last referred to.

The correspondence herewith communicated will show the grounds upon which we contend that the citizens of the United States have, independent of the provisions of the convention of 1824, a right to trade with the natives upon the coast in question, at unoccupied places, liable, however, it is admitted, to be at any time extinguished by the creation of Russian establishments at such points. This right is denied by the Russian Government, which asserts that, by the operation of the treaty of 1824, each party agreed to waive the general right to land on the vacant coasts on the respective sides of the degree of latitude referred to; and accepted, in lieu thereof, the mutual privileges mentioned in the fourth article. The capital and tonnage employed by our citizens in their trade with the northwest coast of America will, perhaps, on adverting to the official statements of the commerce and navigation of the United States for the last few years, be deemed too inconsiderable in amount to attract much attention; yet the subject may, in other respects, deserve the careful consideration of Congress.

I regret to state that the blockade of the principal ports on the eastern coast of Mexico, which, in consequence of differences between that Republic and France, was instituted in May last, unfortunately still continues, enforced by a competent French naval force, and is necessarily embarrassing to our own trade in the gulf, in common with that of other nations. Every disposition, however, is believed to exist on the part of the French Government to render this measure as little onerous as practicable to the interests of the citizens of the United States, and to those of neutral commerce; and it is to be hoped that an early settlement of the difficulties between France and Mexico will soon reestablish the harmonious relations formerly subsisting between them, and again open the ports of that Republic to the vessels of all friendly nations.

A convention for marking that part of the boundary between the United States and the Republic of Texas which extends from the mouth of the Sabine to the Red river, was concluded and signed at this city on the 25th of April last. It has since been ratified by both Governments; and seasonable measures will be taken to carry it into effect on the part of the United States.

The application of that Republic for admission into this Union, made in August, 1837, and which was declined for reasons already made known to you, has been formally withdrawn, as will appear from the accompanying copy of the note of the Minister Plenipotentiary of Texas, which was presented to the Secretary of State on the occasion of the exchange of the ratifications of the convention above mentioned.

Copies of the convention with Texas, of a commercial treaty concluded with the King of Greece, and of a similar treaty with the Peru-Bolivian Confederation, the ratifications of which have been recently exchanged, accompany this message for the information of Congress, and for such legislative enactments as may be found necessary or expedient, in relation to either of them.

To watch over and foster the interests of a gradually increasing and widely-extended commerce; to guard the rights of American citizens, whom business, or pleasure, or other motives, may tempt into distant climes, and at the same time to cultivate those sentiments of mutual respect and good will which experience has proved so beneficial in international intercourse, the Government of the United States has deemed it expedient, from time to time, to establish diplomatic connections with different foreign States, by the appointment of representatives to reside within their respective territories. I am gratified to be enabled to announce to you that, since the close of your last session, these relations have been opened under the happiest auspices with Austria and the Two Sicilies; that new nominations have been made in the respective missions of Russia, Brazil, Belgium, and Sweden and Norway, in this country; and that a Minister Extraordinary has been received, accredited to this Government from the Argentine Confederation.

An exposition of the fiscal affairs of the Government, and of their condition for the past year, will be made to you by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The available balance in the Treasury, on the 1st of January next, is estimated at $2,765,342. The receipts of the year from customs and lands, will probably amount to $20,615,598. These usual sources of revenue have been increased by an issue of Treasury notes—of which less than eight million dollars, including interest and principal, will be outstanding at the end of the year—and by the sale of one of the bonds of the Bank of the United States, for $2,254,871. The aggregate of means from these and other sources, with the balance on hand on the 1st of January last, has been applied to the payment of appropriations by Congress. The whole expenditure for the year on their account, including the redemption of more than eight million Treasury notes, constitutes an aggregate of about forty million dollars, and will still leave in the Treasury the balance before stated.

Nearly eight million dollars of Treasury notes are to be paid during the coming year, in addition to the ordinary appropriations for the support of Government. For both these purposes, the resources of the Treasury will undoubtedly be sufficient, if the charges upon it are not increased beyond the annual estimates. No excess, however, is likely to exist; nor can the postponed installment of the surplus revenue be deposited with the States, nor any considerable appropriations beyond the estimates be made, without causing a deficiency in the Treasury. The great caution, advisable at all times; of limiting appropriations to the wants of the public service, is rendered necessary at present by the prospective and rapid reduction of the tariff; while the vigilant jealousy, evidently excited among the people by the occurrences of the last few years, assures us that they expect from their representatives, and will sustain them in the exercise of, the most rigid economy. Much can be effected by postponing appropriations not immediately required for the ordinary public service, or for any pressing emergency; and much by reducing the expenditures where the entire and immediate accomplishment of the objects in view is not indispensable.

When we call to mind the recent and extreme embarrassments produced by excessive issues of bank paper, aggravated by the unforeseen withdrawal of much foreign capital, and the inevitable derangement arising from the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States, as required by Congress, and consider the heavy expenses incurred by the removal of Indian tribes, by the military operations in Florida, and on account of the unusually large appropriations made at the last two annual sessions of Congress for other objects, we have striking evidence, in the present efficient state of our finances, of the abundant resources of the country, to fulfill all its obligations. Nor is it less gratifying to find that the general business of the community, deeply affected as it has been, is reviving with additional vigor, chastened by the lessons of the past, and animated by the hopes of the future. By the curtailment of paper issues; by curbing the sanguine and adventurous spirit of speculation; and by the honorable application of all available means to the fulfillment of obligations, confidence has been restored both at home and abroad, and ease and facility secured to all the operations of trade.

The agency of the Government in producing these results has been as efficient as its powers and means permitted. By withholding from the States the deposit of the fourth installment, and leaving several millions at long credits with the banks, principally in one section of the country, and more immediately beneficial to it, and, at the same time, aiding the banks and commercial communities in other sections; by postponing the payment of bonds for duties to the amount of between four and five million dollars; by an issue of Treasury notes as a means to enable the Government to meet the consequences of their indulgences, but affording, at the same time, facilities for remittance and exchange; and by steadily declining to employ as general depositories of the public revenues, or receive the notes of all banks which refused to redeem them with specie, by these measures, aided by the favorable action of some of the banks, and by the support and coöperation of a large portion of the community, we have witnessed an early resumption of specie payments in our great commercial capital, promptly followed in almost every part of the United States. This result has been alike salutary to the true interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; to public morals, respect for the laws, and that confidence between man and man which is so essential in all our social relations.

The contrast between the suspension of 1814 and that of 1837 is most striking. The short duration of the latter; the prompt restoration of business; the evident benefits resulting from an adherence by the Government to the constitutional standard of value, instead of sanctioning the suspension by the receipt of irredeemable paper; and the advantages derived from the large amount of specie introduced into the country previous to 1837, afford a valuable illustration of the true policy of the Government in such a crisis; nor can the comparison fail to remove the impression that a national bank is necessary in such emergencies. Not only were specie payments resumed without its aid, but exchanges have also been more rapidly restored than when it existed; thereby showing that private capital, enterprise, and prudence are fully adequate to these ends. On all these points experience seems to have confirmed the views heretofore submitted to Congress. We have been saved the mortification of seeing the distresses of the community for the third time seized on to fasten upon the country so dangerous an institution; and we may also hope that the business of individuals will hereafter be relieved from the injurious effects of a continued agitation of that disturbing subject. The limited influence of a national bank in averting derangement in the exchanges of the country, or in compelling the resumption of specie payments, is now not less apparent than its tendency to increase inordinate speculation by sudden expansions and contractions; its disposition to create panic and embarrassment for the promotion of its own designs; its interference with politics; and its far greater power for evil than for good, either in regard to the local institutions or the operations of Government itself. What was, in these respects, but apprehension or opinion, when a national bank was first established, now stands confirmed by humiliating experience. The scenes through which we have passed conclusively prove how little our commerce, agriculture, manufactures, or finance, require such an institution, and what dangers are attendant on its power—a power, I trust, never to be conferred by the American people upon their Government, and still less upon individuals not responsible to them for its unavoidable abuses.

My conviction of the necessity of further legislative provisions for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public moneys, and my opinion in regard to the measures best adapted to the accomplishment of those objects, have been already submitted to you. These have been strengthened by recent events; and, in the full conviction that time and experience must still further demonstrate their propriety, I feel it my duty, with respectful deference to the conflicting views of others, again to invite your attention to them.

With the exception of limited sums deposited in the few banks still employed under the act of 1836, the amounts received for duties, and, with very inconsiderable exceptions, those accruing from lands also, have, since the general suspension of specie payments by the deposit banks, been kept and disbursed by the Treasurer, under his general legal powers, subject to the superintendence of the Secretary of the Treasury. The propriety of defining more specifically, and of regulating by law the exercise of this wide scope of Executive discretion, has been already submitted to Congress.

A change in the office of collector at one of our principal ports, has brought to light a defalcation of the gravest character, the particulars of which will be laid before you in a special report from the Secretary of the Treasury. By his report and the accompanying documents, it will be seen that the weekly returns of the defaulting officer apparently exhibited, throughout, a faithful administration of the affairs intrusted to his management. It, however, now appears that he commenced abstracting the public moneys shortly after his appointment, and continued to do so, progressively increasing the amount, for the term of more than seven years, embracing a portion of the period during which the public moneys were deposited in the Bank of the United States, the whole of that of the State bank deposit system, and concluding only on his retirement from office, after that system had substantially failed, in consequence of the suspension of specie payments.

The way in which this defalcation was so long concealed, and the steps taken to indemnify the United States, as far as practicable, against loss, will also be presented to you. The case is one which imperatively claims the attention of Congress, and furnishes the strongest motive for the establishment of a more severe and secure system for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public moneys than any that has heretofore existed.

It seems proper, at all events, that by an early enactment similar to that of other countries, the application of public money by an officer of Government to private uses, should be made a felony, and visited with severe and ignominious punishment. This is already, in effect, the law in respect to the Mint, and has been productive of the most salutary results. Whatever system is adopted, such an enactment would be wise as an independent measure, since much of the public moneys must, in their collection and ultimate disbursement, pass twice through the hands of public officers, in whatever manner they are immediately kept. The Government, it must be admitted, has been from its commencement comparatively fortunate in this respect. But the appointing power cannot always be well advised in its selections, and the experience of every country has shown that public officers are not at all times proof against temptation. It is a duty, therefore, which the Government owes, as well to the interests committed to its care as to the officers themselves, to provide every guard against transgressions of this character that is consistent with reason and humanity. Congress cannot be too jealous of the conduct of those who are intrusted with the public money; and I shall, at all times, be disposed to encourage a watchful discharge of this duty. If a more direct cooperation on the part of Congress, in the supervision of the conduct of the officers intrusted with the custody and application of the public money is deemed desirable, it will give me pleasure to assist in the establishment of any judicious and constitutional plan by which that object may be accomplished. You will, in your wisdom, determine upon the propriety of adopting such a plan, and upon the measure necessary to its effectual execution. When the late Bank of the United States was incorporated, and made the depository of the public moneys, a right was reserved to Congress to inspect, at its pleasure, by a committee of that body, the books and the proceedings of the bank.

In one of the States whose banking institutions are supposed to rank among the first in point of stability, they are subjected to constant examination by commissioners appointed for that purpose, and much of the success of its banking system is attributed to this watchful supervision. The same course has also, in view of its beneficial operation, been adopted by an adjoining State, favorably known for the care it has always bestowed upon whatever relates to its financial concerns. I submit to your consideration whether a committee of Congress might not be profitably employed in inspecting, at such intervals as might be deemed proper, the affairs and accounts of officers intrusted with the custody of the public moneys. The frequent performance of this duty might be made obligatory on the committee in respect to those officers who have large sums in their possession, and left discretionary in respect to others. They might report to the Executive such defalcations as were found to exist, with a view to a prompt removal from office unless the default was satisfactorily accounted for; and report, also, to Congress, at the commencement of each session, the result of their examinations and proceedings. It does appear to me that, with a subjection of this class of public officers to the general supervision of the Executive, to examinations by a committee of Congress at periods of which they should have no previous notice, and to prosecution and punishment as for felony for every breach of trust, the safe-keeping of the public moneys, under the system proposed, might be placed on a surer foundation than it has ever occupied since the establishment of the Government.

The Secretary of the Treasury will lay before you additional information containing new details on this interesting subject. To these I ask your early attention. That it should have given rise to great diversity of opinion cannot be a subject of surprise. After the collection and custody of the public moneys had been for so many years connected with, and made subsidiary to, the advancement of private interests, a return to the simple and self-denying ordinances of the Constitution could not but be difficult. But time and free discussion eliciting the sentiments of the people, and aided by that conciliatory spirit which has ever characterized their course on great emergencies, were relied upon for a satisfactory settlement of the question. Already has this anticipation on one important point at least—the impropriety of diverting public money to private purposes—been fully realized. There is no reason to suppose that legislation upon that branch of the subject would now be embarrassed by a difference of opinion, or fail to receive the cordial support of a large majority of our constituents. The connection which formerly existed between the Government and banks, was in reality injurious to both, as well as to the general interests of the community at large. It aggravated the disasters of trade and the derangements of commercial intercourse, and administered new excitement and additional means to wild and reckless speculators, the disappointments of which threw the country into convulsions of panic, and all but produced violence and bloodshed. The imprudent expansion of bank credits, which was the natural result of the command of the revenues of the State furnished the resources for unbounded license in every species of adventure, seduced industry from its regular and salutary occupations by the hope of abundance without labor, and deranged the social state by tempting all trades and professions into the vortex of speculation on remote contingencies.

The same wide-spreading influence impeded also the resources of the Government, curtailed its useful operations, embarrassed the fulfillment of its obligations, and seriously interfered with the execution of the laws. Large appropriations and oppressive taxes are the natural consequences of such a connection, since they increase the profits of those who are allowed to use the public funds, and make it their interest that money should be accumulated and expenditures multiplied. It is thus that a concentrated money power is tempted to become an active agent in political affairs, and all past experience has shown on which side that influence will be arrayed. We deceive ourselves if we suppose that it will ever be found asserting and supporting the rights of the community at large, in opposition to the claims of the few.

In a Government whose distinguishing characteristic should be a diffusion and equalization of its benefits and burdens the advantage of individuals will be augmented at the expense of the mass of the people. Nor is it the nature of combinations for the acquisition of legislative influence to confine their interference to the single object for which they were originally formed. The temptation to extend it to other matters, is, on the contrary, not unfrequently too strong to be resisted. The influence in the direction of the public affairs, of the community at large, is, therefore, in no slight danger of being sensibly and injuriously affected by giving to a comparatively small, but very efficient class, a direct and exclusive personal interest in so important a portion of the legislation of Congress as that which relates to the custody of the public moneys. If laws acting upon private interests cannot always be avoided, they should be confined within the narrowest limits, and left, wherever possible, to the Legislatures of the States. When, not thus restricted, they lead to combinations of powerful associations, foster and influence necessarily selfish, and turn the fair course of legislation to sinister ends, rather than to objects that advance public liberty, and promote the general good.

The whole subject now rests with you; and I cannot but express a hope that some definite measure will be adopted at the present session.

It will not, I am sure, be deemed out of place for me here to remark, that the declaration of my views in opposition to the policy of employing banks as depositories of the Government funds cannot justly be construed as indicative of hostility, official or personal, to those institutions; or to repeat, in this form, and in connection with this subject, opinions which I have uniformly entertained, and on all proper occasions expressed. Though always opposed to their creation in the form of exclusive privileges, and as a State magistrate aiming, by appropriate legislation, to secure the community against the consequences of their occasional mismanagement, I have yet ever wished to see them protected in the exercise of rights conferred by law, and have never doubted their utility, when properly managed, in promoting the interests of trade, and, through that channel, the other interests of the community. To the General Government they present themselves merely as State institutions, having no necessary connection with its legislation or its administration. Like other State establishments, they may be used or not in conducting the affairs of the Government, as public policy and the general interests of the Union may seem to require. The only safe or proper principle upon which their intercourse with the Government can be regulated, is that which regulates their intercourse with the private citizen—the conferring of mutual benefits.

When the Government can accomplish a financial operation better with the aid of the banks than without, it should be at liberty to seek that aid as it would the services of a private banker, or other capitalists or agents, giving the preference to those who will serve it on the best terms. Nor can there ever exist an interest in the officers of the General Government, as such, inducing them to embarrass or annoy the State banks any more than to incur the hostility of any other class of State institutions, or of private citizens. It is not in the nature of things that hostility to those institutions can spring from this source, or any opposition to their course of business, except when they themselves depart from the objects of their creation, and attempt to usurp powers not conferred upon them, or to subvert the standard of value established by the Constitution. While opposition to their regular operations cannot exist in this quarter, resistance to any attempt to make the Government dependent upon them for the successful administration of public affairs is a matter of duty, as I trust it ever will be of inclination, no matter from what motive or consideration the attempt may originate.

It is no more than just to the banks to say that, in the late emergency, most of them firmly resisted the strongest temptations to extend their paper issues, when apparently sustained in a suspension of specie payments by public opinion, even though in some cases invited by legislative enactments. To this honorable course, aided by the resistance of the General Government, acting in obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, to the introduction of an irredeemable paper medium, may be attributed, in a great degree, the speedy restoration of our currency to a sound state, and the business of the country to its wonted prosperity. The banks have but to continue in the same safe course, and be content in their appropriate sphere, to avoid all interference from the General Government, and to derive from it all the protection and benefits which it bestows on other State establishments, on the people of the States, and on the States themselves. In this, their true position, they cannot but secure the confidence and good will of the people and the Government, which they can only lose when, leaping from their legitimate sphere, they attempt to control the legislation of the country, and pervert the operations of the Government to their own purposes.

Our experience under the act passed at the last session, to grant preemption rights to settlers on the public lands, has as yet been too limited to enable us to pronounce with safety upon the efficacy of its provisions to carry out the wise and liberal policy of the Government in that respect. There is, however, the best reason to anticipate favorable results from its operation. The recommendations formerly submitted to you, in respect to a graduation of the price of the public lands, remain to be finally acted upon. Having found no reason to change the views then expressed, your attention to them is again respectfully requested.

Every proper exertion has been made, and will be continued, to carry out the wishes of Congress in relation to the tobacco trade, as indicated in the several resolutions of the House of Representatives and the legislation of the two branches. A favorable impression has, I trust, been made in the different foreign countries to which particular attention has been directed, and although we cannot hope for an early change in their policy, as in many of them a convenient and large revenue is derived from monopolies in the fabrication and sale of this article, yet as these monopolies are really injurious to the people where they are established, and the revenue derived from them may be less injuriously and with equal facility obtained from another and a liberal system of administration, we cannot doubt that our efforts will be eventually crowned with success, if persisted in with temperate firmness, and sustained by prudent legislation.

In recommending to Congress the adoption of the necessary provisions at this session for taking the next census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, the suggestion presents itself whether the scope of the measure might not be usefully extended, by causing it to embrace authentic statistical returns of the great interests specially intrusted to, or necessarily affected by, the legislation of Congress.

The accompanying report of the Secretary of War presents a satisfactory account of the state of the Army, and of the several branches of the public service confided to the superintendence of that officer.

The law increasing and organizing the military establishment of the United States has been nearly carried into effect, and the Army has been extensively and usefully employed during the past season.

I would again call to your notice the subjects connected with and essential to the military defenses of the country, which were submitted to you at the last session, but which were not acted upon, as is supposed, for want of time. The most important of them is the organization of the militia on the maritime and inland frontiers. This measure is deemed important, as it is believed that it will furnish an effective volunteer force in aid of the regular Army, and may form the basis for a general system of organization of the entire militia of the United States. The erection of a national foundry and gunpowder manufactory, and one for making small-arms, the latter to be situated at some point west of the Alleghany mountains, all appear to be of sufficient importance to be again urged upon your attention.

The plan proposed by the Secretary of War for the distribution of the forces of the United States in time of peace, is well calculated to promote regularity and economy in the fiscal administration of the service, to preserve the discipline of the troops, and to render them available for the maintenance of the peace and tranquility of the country. With this view, likewise, I recommend the adoption of the plan presented by that officer for the defense of the western frontier. The preservation of the lives and property of our fellow-citizens who are settled upon that border country, as well as the existence of the Indian population, which might be tempted, by our want of preparation, to rush on their own destruction and attack the white settlements, all seem to require that this subject should be acted upon without delay, and the War Department authorized to place that country in a state of complete defense against any assault from the numerous and warlike tribes which are congregated on that border.

It affords me sincere pleasure to be able to apprise you of the entire removal of the Cherokee nation of Indians to their new homes west of the Mississippi. The measures authorized by Congress at its last session, with a view to the long-standing controversy with them, have had the happiest effects. By an agreement concluded with them by the commanding general in that country, who has performed the duties assigned to him on the occasion with commendable energy and humanity, their removal has been principally under the conduct of their own chiefs, and they have emigrated without any apparent reluctance.

The successful accomplishment of this important object; the removal, also, of the entire Creek nation, with the exception of a small number of fugitives amongst the Seminoles in Florida; the progress already made towards a speedy completion of the removal of the Chickasaws, the Choctaws, the Pottawatomies, the Ottawas, and the Chippewas, with the extensive purchases of Indian lands during the present year, have rendered the speedy and successful result of the long established policy of the Government upon the subject of Indian affairs entirely certain. The occasion is, therefore, deemed a proper one to place this policy in such a point of view as will exonerate the Government of the United States from the undeserved reproach which has been cast upon it through several successive Administrations. That a mixed occupancy of the same territory by the white and red man is incompatible with the safety or happiness of either, is a position in respect to which there has long since ceased to be room for a difference of opinion. Reason and experience have alike demonstrated its impracticability. The bitter fruits of every attempt heretofore to overcome the barriers interposed by nature have only been destruction, both physical and moral, to the Indian; dangerous conflicts of authority between the Federal and State Governments; and detrimental to the individual prosperity of the citizen, as well as to the great improvement of the country. The remedial policy, the principles of which were settled more than thirty years ago, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, consists in an extinction, for a fair consideration, of the title to all the lands still occupied by the Indians within the States and Territories of the United States; their removal to a country west of the Mississippi, much more extensive, and better adapted to their condition, than that on which they then resided; the guarantee to them, by the United States, of their exclusive possession of that country forever, exempt from all intrusions by white men, with ample provisions for their security against external violence and internal dissensions, and the extension to them of suitable facilities for their advancement in civilization. This has not been the policy of particular Administrations only, but of each in succession since the first attempt to carry it out under that of Mr. Monroe. All have labored for its accomplishment, only with different degrees of success. The manner of its execution has, it is true, from time to time, given rise to conflicts of opinion and unjust imputations; but in respect to the wisdom and necessity of the policy itself, there has not, from the beginning, existed a doubt in the mind of any calm, judicious, disinterested friend of the Indian race, accustomed to reflection and enlightened by experience.

Occupying the double character of contractor on its own account, and guardian for the parties contracted with, it was hardly to be expected that the dealings of the Federal Government with the Indian tribes would escape misrepresentation. That there occurred, in the early settlement of this country, as in all others where the civilized race has succeeded to the possessions of the savage, instances of oppression and fraud on the part of the former, there is too much reason to believe. No such offenses can, however, be justly charged upon this Government since it became free to pursue its own course. Its dealings with the Indian tribes have been just and friendly throughout; its efforts for their civilization constant, and directed by the best feelings of humanity; its watchfulness in protecting them from individual frauds unremitting; its forbearance under the keenest provocations, the deepest injuries, and the most flagrant outrages, may challenge, at least, a comparison with any nation, ancient or modern, in similar circumstances; and if in future times a powerful, civilized, and happy nation of Indians shall be found to exist within the limits of this northern continent, it will be owing to the consummation of that policy which has been so unjustly assailed. Only a very brief reference to facts in confirmation of this assertion can in this form be given, and you are, therefore, necessarily referred to the report of the Secretary of War for further details. To the Cherokees, whose case has, perhaps, excited the greatest share of attention and sympathy, the United States have granted in fee, with a perpetual guarantee of exclusive and peaceable possession, thirteen million five hundred and fifty-four thousand one hundred and thirty-five acres of land, on the west side of the Mississippi, eligibly situated, in a healthy climate, and in all respects better suited to their condition than the country they have left, in exchange for only nine million four hundred and ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty acres on the east side of the same river. The United States have, in addition, stipulated to pay them $5,600,000 for their interest in and improvements on the lands thus relinquished, and $1,160,000 for subsistence and other beneficial purposes; thereby putting it in their power to become one of the most wealthy and independent separate communities, of the same extent in the world.

By the treaties made and ratified with the Miami, the Chippewas, the Sioux, the Sacs and Foxes, and the Winnebagoes, during the last year, the Indian title to eighteen million four hundred and fifty-eight thousand acres has been extinguished. These purchases have been much more extensive than those of any previous year, and have, with other Indian expenses, borne very heavily upon the Treasury. They leave, however, but a small quantity of unbought Indian lands within the States and Territories; and the Legislature and Executive were equally sensible of the propriety of a final and more speedy extinction of Indian titles within those limits. The treaties, which were, with a single exception, made in pursuance of previous appropriations for defraying the expenses, have subsequently been ratified by the Senate, and received the sanction of Congress by the appropriations necessary to carry them into effect. Of the terms upon which these important negotiations were concluded, I can speak from direct knowledge; and I feel no difficulty in affirming that the interest of the Indians in the extensive territory embraced by them, is to be paid for at its fair value, and that no more favorable terms have been granted to the United States than would have been reasonably expected in a negotiation with civilized men, fully capable of appreciating and protecting their own rights. For the Indian title of one hundred and sixteen million three hundred and forty-nine thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven acres acquired since the 4th of March, 1829, the United States have paid $72,560,056, in permanent annuities, lands, reservations for Indians, expenses of removal and subsistence, merchandise, mechanical and agricultural establishments, and implements. When the heavy expenses incurred by the United States, and the circumstance that so large a portion of the entire territory will be forever unsalable, are considered, and this price is compared with that for which the United States sell their own lands, no one can doubt that justice has been done to the Indians in these purchases also. Certain it is that the transactions of the Federal Government with the Indians have been uniformly characterized by a sincere and paramount desire to promote their welfare; and it must be a source of the highest gratification to every friend to justice and humanity to learn that, notwithstanding the obstructions from time to time thrown in its way, and the difficulties which have arisen from the peculiar and impracticable nature of the Indian character, the wise, humane, and undeviating policy of the Government in this, the most difficult of all our relations, foreign or domestic, has at length been justified to the world in its near approach to a happy and certain consummation.

The condition of the tribes which occupy the country set apart for them in the West is highly prosperous, and encourages the hope of their early civilization. They have, for the most part, abandoned the hunter state, and turned their attention to agricultural pursuits. All those who have been established for any length of time in that fertile region, maintain themselves by their own industry. There are among them traders of no inconsiderable capital, and planters exporting cotton to some extent; but the greater number are small agriculturists, living in comfort upon the produce of their farms. The recent emigrants, although they have in some instances removed reluctantly, have readily acquiesced in their unavoidable destiny. They have found at once a recompense for past sufferings, and an incentive to industrious habits, in the abundance and comforts around them. There is reason to believe that all these tribes are friendly in their feelings towards the United States; and it is to be hoped that the acquisition of individual wealth, the pursuits of agriculture, and habits of industry, will gradually subdue their warlike propensities, and incline them to maintain peace among themselves. To effect this desirable object, the attention of Congress is solicited to the measures recommended by the Secretary of War for their future government and protection, as well from each other as from the hostility of the warlike tribes around them, and the intrusion of the whites. The policy of the Government has given them a permanent home, and guaranteed to them its peaceful and undisturbed possession. It only remains to give them a government and laws which will encourage industry, and secure to them the rewards of their exertions. The importance of some form of government cannot be too much insisted upon. The earliest effects will be to diminish the causes and occasions for hostilities among the tribes, to inspire an interest in the observance of laws to which they will have themselves assented, and to multiply the securities of property, and the motives for self-improvement. Intimately connected with this subject is the establishment of the military defenses recommended by the Secretary of War, which have been already referred to. Without them, the Government will be powerless to redeem its pledges of protection to the emigrating Indians against the numerous warlike tribes that surround them, and to provide for the safety of the frontier settlers of the bordering States.

The case of the Seminoles constitutes at present the only exception to the successful efforts of the Government to remove the Indians to the homes assigned them west of the Mississippi. Four hundred of this tribe emigrated in 1836, and fifteen hundred in 1837 and 1838, leaving in the country, it is supposed, about two thousand Indians. The continued treacherous conduct of these people; the savage and unprovoked murders they have lately committed, butchering whole families of the settlers of the Territory, without distinction of age or sex, and making their way into the very center and heart of the country, so that no part of it is free from their ravages; their frequent attacks on the light-houses along that dangerous coast; and the barbarity with which they have murdered the passengers and crews of such vessels as have been wrecked upon the reefs and keys which border the Gulf, leave the Government no alternative but to continue the military operations against them until they are totally expelled from Florida.

There are other motives which would urge the Government to pursue this course towards the Seminoles. The United States have fulfilled in good faith all their treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, and have, in every other instance, insisted upon a like performance of their obligations. To relax from this salutary rule because the Seminoles have maintained themselves so long in the territory they had relinquished, and, in defiance of their frequent and solemn engagements, still continue to wage a ruthless war against the United States, would not only evince a want of constancy on our part, but be of evil example in our intercourse with other tribes. Experience has shown that but little is to be gained by the march of armies through a country so intersected with inaccessible swamps and marshes, and which, from the fatal character of the climate, must be abandoned at the end of the winter. I recommend, therefore, to your attention, the plan submitted by the Secretary of War in the accompanying report, for the permanent occupation of the portion of the territory freed from the Indians, and the more efficient protection of the people of Florida from their inhuman warfare.

From the report of the Secretary of the Navy, herewith transmitted, it will appear that a large portion of the disposable naval force is either actively employed, or in a state of preparation for the purposes of experience and discipline, and the protection of our commerce. So effectual has been this protection, that, so far as the information of Government extends, not a single outrage has been attempted on a vessel carrying the flag of the United States, within the present year, in any quarter, however distant or exposed.

The exploring expedition sailed from Norfolk on the 19th of August last; and information has been received of its safe arrival at the island of Madeira. The best spirit animates the officers and crews, and there is every reason to anticipate from its efforts, results beneficial to commerce and honorable to the nation.

It will also be seen that no reduction of the force now in commission is contemplated. The unsettled state of a portion of South America renders it indispensable that our commerce should receive protection in that quarter; the vast and increasing interests embarked in the trade of the Indian and China seas, in the whale fisheries of the Pacific ocean, and in the Gulf of Mexico, require equal attention to their safety; and a small squadron may be employed to great advantage on our Atlantic coast, in meeting sudden demands for the reinforcement of other stations, in aiding merchant vessels in distress, in affording active service to an additional number of officers, and in visiting the different ports of the United States, an accurate knowledge of which is obviously of the highest importance.

The attention of Congress is respectfully called to that portion of the report recommending an increase in the number of smaller vessels, and to other suggestions contained in that document. The rapid increase and wide expansion of our commerce, which is every day seeking new avenues of profitable adventure; the absolute necessity of a naval force for its protection precisely in the degree of its extension; a due regard to the national rights and honor; the recollection of its former exploits, and the anticipation of its future triumphs whenever opportunity presents itself, which we may rightfully indulge from the experience of the past, all seem to point to the Navy as a most efficient arm of our national defense and a proper object of legislative encouragement.

The progress and condition of the Post Office Department will be seen by reference to the report of the Postmaster General. The extent of post roads, covered by mail contracts, is stated to be one hundred and thirty-four thousand eight hundred and eighteen miles, and the annual transportation upon them thirty-four millions five hundred and eighty thousand two hundred and two. The number of post offices in the United States is twelve thousand five hundred and fifty-three, and rapidly increasing. The gross revenue for the year ending on the 30th day of June last, was $4,262,145. The accruing expenditures, $4,680,068; excess of expenditures, $417,923. This has been made up out of the surplus previously on hand. The cash on hand on the first instant, was $314,068. The revenue for the year ending June 30, 1838, was $161,540 more than that for the year ending June 30, 1837. The expenditures of the Department had been graduated upon the anticipation of a largely increased revenue. A moderate curtailment of mail service consequently became necessary, and has been effected, to shield the Department against the danger of embarrassment. Its revenue is now improving, and it will soon resume its onward course in the march of improvement.

Your particular attention is requested to so much of the Postmaster General's report as relates to the transportation of the mails upon railroads. The laws on that subject do not seem adequate to secure that service, now become almost essential to the public interests, and at the same time protect the Department from combinations and unreasonable demands.

Nor can I too earnestly request your attention to the necessity of providing a more secure building for this Department. The danger of destruction to which its important books and papers are continually exposed, as well from the highly combustible character of the building occupied as from that of others in the vicinity, calls loudly for prompt action.

Your attention is again earnestly invited to the suggestions and recommendations submitted at the last session in respect to the District of Columbia.

I feel it my duty, also, to bring to your notice certain proceedings at law which have recently been prosecuted in this District, in the name of the United States, on the relation of Messrs. Stockton and Stokes, of the State of Maryland, against the Postmaster General, and which have resulted in the payment of money out of the national Treasury, for the first time since the establishment of the Government, by judicial compulsion exercised by the common law writ of mandamus, issued by the circuit court of this District.

The facts of the case, and the grounds of the proceedings, will be found fully stated in the report of the decision; and any additional information which you may desire will be supplied by the proper Department. No interference in the particular case is contemplated. The money has been paid; the claims of the prosecutors have been satisfied; and the whole subject, so far as they are concerned, is finally disposed of; but it is on the supposition that the case may be regarded as an authoritative exposition of the law as it now stands that I have thought it necessary to present it to your consideration.

The object of the application to the circuit court was to compel the Postmaster General to carry into effect an award made by the Solicitor of the Treasury, under a special act of Congress for the settlement of certain claims of the relators on the Post Office Department, which award the Postmaster General declined to execute in full, until he should receive further legislative direction on the subject. If the duty imposed on the Postmaster General, by that law, was to be regarded as one of an official nature, belonging to his office as a branch of the Executive, then it is obvious that the constitutional competency of the Judiciary to direct and control him in its discharge was necessarily drawn in question. And if the duty so imposed on the Postmaster General was to be considered as merely ministerial, and not executive, it yet remained to be shown that the circuit court of this District had authority to interfere by mandamus—such a power having never before been asserted or claimed by that court. With a view to the settlement of these important questions, the judgment of the circuit court was carried, by a writ of error, to the Supreme Court of the United States. In the opinion of that tribunal, the duty imposed on the Postmaster General was not an official, executive duty, but one of a merely ministerial nature. The grave constitutional questions which had been discussed were, therefore, excluded from the decision of the case; the court, indeed, expressly admitting that, with powers and duties properly belonging to the Executive, no other department can interfere by the writ of mandamus; and the question, therefore, resolved itself into this: has Congress conferred upon the circuit court of this District the power to issue such a writ to an officer of the General Government, commanding him to perform a ministerial act? A majority of the court have decided that it has, but have founded their decision upon a process of reasoning which, in my judgment, renders further legislative provision indispensable to the public interests and the equal administration of justice.

It has long since been decided by the Supreme Court, that neither that tribunal nor the circuit courts of the United States held within the respective States, possess the power in question; but it is now held that this power, denied to both of these high tribunals—to the former by the Constitution and to the latter by Congress—has been, by its legislation, vested in the circuit court of this District. No such direct grant of power to the circuit court of this District is claimed; but it has been held to result, by necessary implication, from several sections of the law establishing the court. One of these sections declares that the laws of Maryland, as they existed at the time of the cession, should be in force in that part of the District ceded by that State; and, by this provision, the common law, in civil and criminal cases, as it prevailed in Maryland, in 1801, was established in that part of the District.

In England, the Court of King's Bench—because the sovereign, who, according to the theory of the Constitution, is the fountain of justice, originally sat there in person, and is still deemed to be present, in construction of law—alone possesses the high power of issuing the writ of mandamus, not only to inferior jurisdictions and corporations, but also to magistrates and others, commanding them, in the King's name, to do what their duty requires, in cases where there is a vested right, and no other specific remedy. It has been held, in the case referred to, that, as the Supreme Court of the United States is, by the Constitution, rendered incompetent to exercise this power, and as the circuit court of this District is a court of general jurisdiction in cases at common law, and the highest court of original jurisdiction in the District, the right to issue the writ of mandamus is incident to its common law powers. Another ground relied upon to maintain the power in question is, that it was included, by fair construction, in the power it granted to the circuit courts of the United States by the act "to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," passed 13th of February, 1801; that the act establishing the circuit court of this District, passed the 27th day of February, 1801, conferred upon that court and the judges thereof the same powers as were by law vested in the circuit courts of the United States and in the judges of the said courts; that the repeal of the first mentioned act, which took place in the next year, did not divest the circuit court of this District of the authority in dispute, but left it still clothed with the powers over the subject which, it is conceded, were taken away from the circuit courts of the United States by the repeal of the act of 13th February, 1801.

Admitting that the adoption of the laws of Maryland for a portion of this District confers on the circuit court thereof, in that portion, the transcendent extra-judicial prerogative powers of the Court of King's Bench, in England, or that either of the acts of Congress, by necessary implication, authorize the former court to issue a writ of mandamus to an officer of the United States, to compel him to perform a ministerial duty, the consequences are, in one respect, the same. The result in either case is, that the officers of the United States, stationed in different parts of the United States, are, in respect to the performance of their official duties, subject to different laws and a different supervision, those in the States to one rule, and those in the District of Columbia to another and a very different one. In the District their official conduct is subject to a judicial control, from which, in the States, they are exempt.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the expediency of vesting such a power in the judiciary, in a system of Government constituted like that of the United States, all must agree that these disparaging discrepancies in the law and in the administration of justice ought not to be permitted to continue; and as Congress alone can provide the remedy, the subject is unavoidably presented to your consideration.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 3, 1838.

The message having been read,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the usual number of copies be printed, and that five thousand additional copies without the documents, and fifteen hundred copies with the documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 4, 1838.

HUGH A. GARLAND, Esq., Clerk elect of the House of Representatives, presented himself at the Speaker's table, and took the oath of office.

The message from the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses to wait on the President, and inform him that they were ready to receive any communication from him, was taken up, as the business first in order, and concurred in.

The committee on the part of the House was ordered to consist of three, and was composed of the following gentlemen: Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. CONNOR, and Mr. LINCOLN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS; which was read:

To the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the request of Mr. George Washington Lafayette, and of the respective family of our late illustrious and ever venerated friend, General Lafayette, I have the honor of presenting to Congress, in their name, a copy of the memoirs and writings of their honored parent, recently published by them, to be deposited in the Library of Congress.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Monday, December 3, 1838.

Mr. A. then submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to nem diss.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of this Congress be presented to George Washington Lafayette, the son, and to the surviving family, of the late illustrious and lamented General Lafayette, for the copy of his memoirs and writings, recently published by them, and presented in their name to this Congress, to be deposited in their Library; and that the same be deposited in the said Library accordingly.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the usual order for furnishing members with newspapers, not to exceed the price of three daily papers, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GRENNEILL, a joint resolution for the election of two chaplains to the two Houses for the present session was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following; which was rejected:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report a plan for carrying into effect, as far as practicable, the order of the House of the 2d July last, directing that, in the new arrangement of the Hall, the members should be entitled, as near as may be, to the same relative position to the Chair which they then occupied, or to devise and report such other mode of assigning seats to members as the committee may deem equitable and proper.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That all the petitions, memorials, and remonstrances against the annexation of the Republic of Texas to the United States, presented at the first and second sessions of the present Congress, together with the resolutions of the Legislatures of the States of Alabama, Tennessee, Vermont, Rhode Island, Ohio, Michigan, and Massachusetts, now on file in the clerk's office, relating to that subject, be taken from the said files, and referred to a select committee of — members, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. HOWARD moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MERCER requested the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw the motion for a moment to enable him (Mr. M.) to propound a question to that gentleman. Mr. M. promised to renew the motion.

Mr. HOWARD withdrew it.

Mr. MERCER wished to know whether the application of the Republic of Texas for admission into this Union had not been withdrawn?

Mr. HOWARD was understood to express his belief that it had, though he had no other knowledge of the fact than that derived from the newspapers.

Mr. MERCER renewed the motion to lay on the table, and it prevailed—yeas 136, nays 61.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. McKENNA submitted a resolution to remove the drapery in the galleries of the Hall.

The resolution was rejected.

DUELLING IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ADAMS gave notice that, on to-morrow, he should call up the bill for the prevention of duelling in the District of Columbia.

ANDREW STEVENSON.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a committee of — members be appointed, with leave to send for persons and papers, to inquire and report to this House:

1. Whether Andrew Stevenson, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, at London, is, or has recently been, engaged in a public newspaper controversy, involving his personal integrity and the honor of his country, whose representative he is, with Daniel O'Connell, a member of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

2. Whether the said Andrew Stevenson, holding the privileged character of an Ambassador, has, in concert with three other persons, citizens of the United States, one of whom, an officer in their Navy, engaged in a conspiracy with intent to stop the wind, or, in the language of the laws of God and of man, to murder the said Daniel O'Connell in a duel, or by a premeditated provocation to a brawl.

3. Whether the said Andrew Stevenson, after a written demand of explanation, in the form usual among duellists, as preliminary to a challenge, and with the intent to follow it up by a challenge, preconcerted with the said three other citizens of the United States, did accept of an answer from the said Daniel O'Connell, equally unsatisfactory to the codes of genuine and of spurious honor, and thereby tacitly admit the truth of the imputation upon his honor, at which he had professed to take offense.

4. Whether the said Andrew Stevenson, in these transactions, has violated the duties of his office as an ambassador of peace, the laws of nations, the laws of the land to the Government of which he was accredited, the privileges of the British House of Commons, in the person of one of its members, and the honor and interest of his own country.

5. Whether the said Andrew Stevenson has, in these transactions, so conducted himself as to require the constitutional interposition of this House, by impeachment or otherwise.

Mr. HOWARD remarked that the resolutions covered a great deal of ground; and in the hope, too, that the gentleman from Massachusetts would consent to the motion, he moved that their consideration be postponed till Monday next.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS hoped the mover of the last motion would withdraw it, and suffer it to lie over.

Mr. HOPKINS, believing no good could result from a discussion upon such a subject, could not consent to withdraw it.

The motion to lay on the table prevailed—yeas 140, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Clark, Clowney, Coffin, Coles, Crabb, Craig, Cray, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, De Graff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Dunn, Elmore, Ewing, Fairfield, Foster, James Garland, Glascock, William Graham, Grandland, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Herod, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. White, John White, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, and Worthington—140.

NAVS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, Andrews, Ayer, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, William Cost Johnson, Lincoln, Marvin, Samson, Mason, McKean, Mercer, Mitchell, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Wise, and Yorke—57.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the joint committee on the part of the House appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that they had discharged that duty, and the President had informed them, in reply, that he would transmit to the two Houses a message to-day.

The President's annual Message was then brought in by his private secretary, and, being laid before the House by the Speaker, was read at length by the Clerk.

Mr. HAYNES moved that the message and accompanying documents be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that fifteen thousand copies without the documents, and five thousand with the documents, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. BELL did not raise any particular objection to the printing, though he would prefer a less number, because the message would be far more widely disseminated through the newspapers than by the members, but he objected to the other branch of the motion at this time. He requested the Clerk to read the entry on the Journal of last session, which was done.

Mr. B. added that he believed that message was never taken up in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but discussed at the present stage, and such was his object in reference to the present message. He desired to express his sentiments upon a number of the topics embraced in it as early as possible; but unless occasion was taken to do so on the motion to commit, they could hope for no other opportunity. He hoped, therefore, the question would be taken on the printing, and the other motion laid over.

Mr. HAYNES said the gentleman was entirely mistaken in the supposition that the last annual message was never considered in Committee of the Whole. It was discussed again and again in that committee; and a number of gentlemen had addressed the House upon it.

Mr. BELL might be mistaken as to that point; but no disposition was made of the message.

Mr. HAYNES stated what was the fact, that all the message had been disposed of except that part in relation to the finances. But what was the great object of sending it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? It was that the widest scope of debate should be given.

Mr. H. then varied his motion to the terms of that on the Journal, viz: to print fifteen thousand copies of the message and accompanying documents, and five thousand copies without; the latter to be furnished within two days.

After some further conversation between Messrs. Wise, James Garland, and Haynes, the motion was agreed to without a division.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances; which,

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, was laid on the table; and, at the suggestion of several members, ten thousand extra copies ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of State covering a statement of the expenditures out of the contingent fund of that Department for the past year; which,

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, was laid on the table.

WIDOW OF W. S. FRANKLIN.

Mr. LOGAN, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the widow of WALTER S. FRANKLIN, deceased, late Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, be allowed and paid, out of the contingent fund, his salary as Clerk aforesaid, up to the 3d December, 1838.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McKENNAN suggested to his colleague to cause the resolution to read up to the "3d of December," when the new Clerk took upon himself the duties.

Mr. LOGAN so modified it

Mr. WISE asked when Mr. Franklin died?

The CHAIR replied, from the information contained in Mr. Burch's letter of yesterday, on the 20th of September.

Mr. WISE moved to make it that day; for though no one lamented Mr. Franklin's death more than he did, he could not vote a mere gratuity without service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD reminded Mr. W. that up to the time of Mr. Franklin's decease his salary belonged to his executors.

Mr. WISE thereupon withdrew his amendment.

The resolution was warmly sustained by Mr. McKENNAN and Mr. GLASCOCK, when it was agreed to—yeas 93, nays 63.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 5, 1838.

Mr. BROWN, of North Carolina, and Mr. LYON, of Michigan, appeared in their places in the Senate.

The joint resolution from the House, presenting the thanks of Congress to George Washington La Fayette, and the surviving family of General La Fayette, was taken up for consideration; and, on motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, laid upon the table.

Mr. NORVELL gave notice that, on to-morrow, he would ask leave to bring in a bill making certain grants of public land, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUCHANAN gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Thomas Sumpter.

Mr. PRENTISS gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in several bills, the titles of which were not heard.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of State, containing an account of the contingent expenses of that Department during the past year; which,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Treasurer of the United States, made in compliance with the act of 1789, establishing the Treasury Department.

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing his annual report on the finances; which,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, was laid upon the table, and fifteen hundred additional copies ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

REPORT ON THE FINANCES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

December 3, 1838.

The undersigned respectfully submits the following report in obedience to the "Act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department:"

I.—OF THE REVENUE AND EXPENDITURES.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1839, which will then be available and applicable to public purposes, is estimated at $2,765,342 36.

This result is derived from the following data:

On the 1st of January, 1837, the balance in the Treasury, exclusive of trust funds and those belonging to the Post Office, was.....$46,337,688 36

The receipts during that year, from all sources, exclusive of the funds aforesaid, were—

Customs.....$11,169,290 39
Lands.....6,776,236 52
Miscellaneous.....1,705,457 47
Treasury notes.....2,992,989 15

22,643,973 53

These, with the balance last mentioned, constitute an aggregate of.....$68,981,661 89

The expenditures during the same year, exclusive of the trust funds and those belonging to the Post Office, were—

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous.....$5,524,252 78

Military service, including fortifications, Indian affairs, pensions, arming the militia, the Florida war, removal of the Cherokees and Creeks, improvement of rivers and harbors, constructing roads, and building armories and arsenals, 19,417,274 44

Naval service, including gradual improvement and exploring expedition.....6,852,059 80

Public debt.....21,822 91

This left in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1838, a balance of.....$37,166,251 98

The receipts during the first three quarters of 1838, with exceptions similar to those before named, are ascertained and estimated to have been as follows:

Customs, including postponed bonds.....$12,228,770 56

[Of this sum, about $2,900,000, received in Treasury notes, cannot, until the settlements to which they belong shall be completed by the accounting officers, be entered upon the Register's books. A part will be carried into the Treasury by warrant during the fourth quarter, and the remainder next year.]

Miscellaneous.....238,431 85

Proceeds of third bond of United States Bank sold for.....2,254,871 38

Part of second bond.....1,600,000 00

Issue of Treasury notes.....12,716,820 86

31,075,723 19

The further receipts in the fourth quarter are estimated as follows:

Customs, estimating the actual receipts during the quarter, and not the sums which may be formally carried upon the Register's books from former quarters.....$5,250,000 00

Lands.....1,160,000 00

[Including only a portion of the preëmptions, and such of the sales as may be actually paid into the Treasury before the year expires.]

Miscellaneous.....15,000 00

On second bond of the United States Bank, due in September, 1838, and paid in part before and part after that date.....687,230 84

7,052,230 84

These united made the aggregate of receipts for the year 1838, as ascertained and estimated.....$38,127,954 03

This, with the balance on the 1st of January last, would amount to.....$75,294,206 01

The expenditures during the first three quarters of 1838, with similar exceptions, were—

Civil list, &c.....$4,099,674 13

Military service, &c.....15,731,323 62

Naval service, &c.....4,325,563 21

Public debt.....1,217 08

Redemption of Treasury notes, including interest.....4,330,440 64

22,427,218 68

The expenditures during the fourth quarter, including $1,000 interest on the funded debt, and the redemption of $3,750,000 of Treasury notes, are estimated by the different departments at $13,511,920 10; but it is not expected that the redemption of all these notes will appear on the Register's books until next year. Nor does the undersigned anticipate that the actual expenditures within this quarter, including the above notes redeemed, will exceed.....12,000,000 00

Making an aggregate of expenditures for the year 1838, of.....$40,427,218 68

This computation would leave in the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1839, a balance of $34,866,987 33.

It is proper to ascertain, in the next place, how much of this balance is not immediately available and applicable to public purposes.

The sum of $28,101,644 97, which has been placed with the States for safe-keeping, is a part of that balance, and cannot, by the provisions of the act of October 14, 1837, be made available till directed by Congress.

Another part is about one million one hundred thousand dollars, due chiefly from various insolvent banks, on account of the money that, before 1837, had been placed in their custody to the credit of the Treasurer, and still remains unpaid.

Another portion is near two million four hundred thousand dollars, which is due from banks that suspended specie payments in 1837, and will probably not be paid during the present year.

About five hundred thousand dollars of the amount which has been placed in the Mint, for the specific purposes designated in the laws on that subject, is another part of that balance, which could not at once be made available for other objects without much public inconvenience.

The aggregate of these items, not immediately available and applicable to public purposes, is $32,101,644 97; and if deducted from the foregoing balance, it would leave, on the 1st of January next, as stated in the commencement of this report, only the sum of $2,765,342 36 then available, and applicable to those purposes.

Subjoined is a condensed view of the receipts and means, as well as the expenditures, for 1838, as ascertained and estimated; also, the funds not available in that year:

SUMMARY FOR 1838.

Receipts or Means.

Balance on the 1st of January, 1838.....	$37,166,251 98
Receipts from customs.....	17,478,770 56
Receipts from lands.....	3,136,828 54
Miscellaneous.....	253,431 85
Treasury notes issued.....	12,716,820 86

Deduct total unavailable as above.....	32,101,644 97
Available balance remaining.....	$2,765,342 36

II.—OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The payments on account of the funded and unfunded debt, since the 1st December, 1837, have been as follows:

1. On account of the principal and interest of the funded debt:
Principal.....	$215 27
Interest.....	2,001 81
	$2,217 08

Leaving unclaimed and undischarged—
Principal.....	$75,954 47
Interest.....	249,566 36
	$325,520 83

2. On account of the unfunded debt existing previous to 1837, including $1 08 interest on Treasury notes of 1815, $21 08, leaving the amount of certificates and notes payable on presentation—
Certificates issued for claims during the revolutionary war, and registered prior to 1795.....	$27,293 31
Treasury notes issued during the late war.....	5,300 00
Certificates of Mississippi stock.....	4,320 09
	$36,913 40

In addition to the above, the United States, under the act of the 20th May, 1836, for the relief of the corporate cities of the District of Columbia, have assumed the following debts, bearing an interest of five per cent., exclusive of charges:

Of the city of Washington.....	$1,000,000
“ Alexandria.....	250,000
“ Georgetown.....	250,000
	$1,500,000

The payments for the year 1838, on account of the interest and charges on this debt, amount to.....$76,995 99

III.—STATEMENT IN RELATION TO THE ISSUE AND REDEMPTION OF TREASURY NOTES IN 1837 AND 1838.

Issued under the act of 12th October, 1837.....	$10,000,000 00
Issued under the act of 21st May, 1838.....	5,709,810 01
	$15,709,810 01

Of this amount
$6,888,809 60 were at 6 per cent.
4,280,273 72 “ 5 per cent.
2,784,844 73 “ 2 per cent.
1,755,881 96 “ 1 mill per cent.

The following amount has been redeemed:
There have been entered to the credit of the “account of the redemption of Treasury notes,” on the books of the Register.....	$5,063,197 41
And there have been canceled and returned to the Treasury, and are now in course of settlement, as appears from the records of the First Auditor and the Commissioner of the General Land office.....	2,892,052 59
	7,955,250 00
Leaving outstanding.....	$7,754,560 01

III.—EXPLANATIONS AS TO THE APPROPRIATIONS OUTSTANDING.

The appropriations heretofore made, which will remain unsatisfied at the end of the year 1838, and be chargeable on the balance then in the Treasury, and the revenue subsequently received, are estimated by the other departments at $13,187,426 83, but by the undersigned at $1,511,920 10 more, in consequence of estimating the expenditures of the fourth quarter differently.

Upon the view taken by this Department, it is computed that $12,369,623 68 of those appropriations will be required to be paid, in order to accomplish the objects contemplated by them.

Of the remainder, about $370,360 40 may go to the surplus fund, or not be needed to accomplish those objects; and the residue, being $1,959,362 85, it is proposed to apply to the service of the ensuing year, without reappropriation.

IV.—ESTIMATE OF THE RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES FOR 1839.

The receipts into the Treasury during the year 1839, are estimated as follows:
Customs.....	$19,000,000 00
Lands.....	4,500,000 00
Miscellaneous.....	500,000 00
The proceeds of the fourth bond of the United States Bank, if sold.....	2,380,000 00
And the sums likely to be realized from former deposit banks on installments which become due in 1839.....	2,400,000 00
	$28,780,000 00

These, with the estimated balance of $2,765,342, in the Treasury, which, on the 1st of January, 1839, will be available and applicable to public purposes, constitute an aggregate of efficient means amounting to, $31,545,342 00

The expenditures for 1839, including the redemption of $8,000,000 of Treasury notes, and interest, falling due in that year, are estimated as follows:

Thus, of the old appropriations which will be outstanding on the 1st of January, 1839, it is computed that there will be expended in that year.....	$7,500,000 00
The Treasury notes to be redeemed, and interest, will amount to about.....	8,000,000 00
Of the new appropriations called for, together with those which are permanent for 1839, it is computed that there will be expended within the year.....	15,000,000 00

These constitute an aggregate of actual expenditures for 1839, estimated at.....

30,500,000 00
Leaving a balance in the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1839, available and applicable to public purposes, amounting to.....	$1,045,342 00

The estimates for new appropriations now presented from the different Departments, amount to.....$21,665,089 95
To these may be added permanent appropriations for the service of 1839, made by former acts, equal to.....

9,894,000 00

These make all the new and permanent appropriations for 1839, viz:
Civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous.....$3,658,157 87
Military service, &c.....13,969,836 01
Naval service, &c.....5,881,096 07
Redemption of Treasury notes, and other public debt.....8,050,000 00
$31,559,089 95

For further particulars see the details of the annual estimates.

It will be perceived by these statements, that no surplus balance will probably exist either on the 1st of January, 1839, or during that year, to be deposited with the several States for safe-keeping, as a fourth installment under the deposit act of June 23, 1836. Indeed great care will be necessary in restricting the appropriations to the necessary wants of the Government, or the receipts will not be sufficient to meet the current demands on the Treasury, unless those receipts should unexpectedly exceed the present estimates.

When an unusual excess existed in the Treasury, it was proposed to place that fourth installment with the States for safe-keeping till needed; but before it became payable, the money was wanted to discharge existing appropriations. The deposit of it was therefore postponed by Congress till next January, and the money has been used by the United States, to which it belonged, without incurring the expense and inconvenience, to all the parties concerned, of paying and then immediately recalling it. That installment is not a debt due to the States, and, hence, is not required to be paid like an appropriation for the public service. Yet the remark may properly be added, that if a surplus should hereafter accrue, large enough, after defraying all the existing charges imposed by Congress upon the Treasury, to make the deposit originally contemplated, this Department, with its present views, would feel bound to carry it into effect, unless Congress, in the mean time, should further modify the laws now in force in relation to the subject.

V.—EXPORTS AND IMPORTS IN 1838.

The exports during the year ending September 30, 1838, are computed to have been $103,136,000. Of these, about $90,666,000 were of domestic, and $12,470,000 of foreign origin.

The former having diminished from the previous year, $4,898,414, and the latter, $9,384,962. The imports for the same year amounted to $112,000,000.

These are $28,989,217 less in value than those of the previous year, being nearly $78,000,000 less than those under the enormous overtrading and other overactions which characterized 1836.

For further particulars reference may be had to the table annexed.

It is an interesting fact that during the last three years more than $86,000,000 annually, or an average of nearly nine tenths of our whole domestic exports, have been derived from agriculture. More than seven tenths of our whole population are probably employed in that useful pursuit.

VI.—EXPLANATIONS OF THE ESTIMATES OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES, AND SUGGESTIONS ON THE MODE OF MEETING FLUCTUATIONS IN THEM.

The receipts from customs during the present year will vary but little from the estimates submitted in the last annual report. The receipts from lands will be less; but the amount of sales made, and preemption rights existing, will not differ essentially from what was anticipated, though the act of Congress, as to the latter, passed so late that payments for all of them could not be realized till another year, without causing much inconvenience and unnecessary pressure in some portions of the country.

The estimates presented for new appropriations and for expenditures, in 1838, were quite as large as the views of the different Departments, at the time Congress assembled in December last, appeared to justify; but the unexpected continuance of the Florida war, a solicitude to induce the Cherokees to remove peaceably, and an earnest desire to suppress with promptitude all threatened disturbances on our northern frontier, with several other measures of less importance, originating in Congress, led that body to make appropriations amounting to nearly ten millions beyond those requested in the annual estimates. Some provision of additional means, corresponding to this excess, became, therefore, necessary; and, in order to discharge the excess, and guard against contingencies, as well as avert the consequences of a protracted suspension of specie payments by the banks, Congress wisely granted the additional authority both to sell the bonds of the United States Bank and to issue new Treasury notes, instead of such as might be paid in before the time for their redemption arrived. The apprehensions of embarrassments in the finances within the year, which had arisen from those unexpected appropriations, and from the failure that then continued among the banks in most quarters of the Union to return to specie payments, were removed by these opportune provisions. Occasions, however, have not yet arisen to require the full use of either of them.

The whole amount of Treasury notes outstanding at any one time since they were first authorized, in October, 1837, has never equaled ten million dollars. The amount now outstanding is only $7,754,560. Besides the restrictions on the sale of the bonds of the United States Bank, the want of power to guaranty their eventual payment, and the short period they had to run, with the great quantity of State stocks in the market of a better character for permanent investment, caused some temporary inconvenience, and prevented any offer for them above par, either at home or abroad. The sale, however, of one becoming expedient, it was effected within the limitations prescribed. It has not yet been found necessary to dispose of the other. But it is expected that, when the period for redeeming most of the outstanding Treasury notes arrives, it must be sold, unless other means to meet the public engagements shall, in the mean time, be provided by Congress.

If the receipts from customs or lands should exceed the estimates made for the ensuing year, which, in the vacillations of trade, is not very improbable, still it is not supposed the excess will be so large that all the expected charges on the year can be defrayed without a sale of the remaining bond, or some equivalent resource.

The estimates of receipts for 1839 rest on the following general views: An overflowing tide of speculation and bank issues, like that of 1836, is not anticipated, while the recent evils and disasters from these sources are fresh in remembrance. Nor, on the contrary, is any expectation entertained of a repetition, so soon, of the mercantile revulsions which characterized the year 1837.

The receipts from duties during the last year, if the bonds had not been postponed, would have been about sixteen million dollars. Those of the present year, in the ordinary operation of the laws, without the postponed bonds, will not probably exceed $13,000,000.

By supposing a large increase of fifty per cent. in 1839, beyond the ordinary receipts for the last year, they would amount to between nineteen and twenty millions, and would be larger than the receipts of 1835. Such an increase would be greater than in any previous year of our history, not affected by commercial restrictions, foreign wars, or important changes in the tariff.

Considering that, under the present credits, the duties actually paid within any calendar year must be estimated chiefly on the imports from the 1st of July preceding to the 1st of July in that year, and that two biennial reductions in the tariff have occurred since 1835, it is believed that nineteen or twenty millions is an estimate sufficiently high for 1839.

But as the receipts of late have depended, much less than formerly, when credits were longer and almost universal, on the amount of bonds taken in previous years, the estimates must be much more conjectural; and intestine commotions, wars in Europe or on our own borders, fluctuations in crops or prices, and various other contingencies in the ensuing year, which cannot be foreseen or computed, may vary the result several millions.

The reduced receipts both from lands and duties in 1837 and 1838, as compared with the two preceding years, were anticipated by the Department in 1836, and a permanent provision to meet any deficiency was earnestly urged on the consideration of Congress.

Confident as were the expectations entertained by many that the revenue of 1837 would be so great as to justify further large deposits with the States, and severe as were the censures bestowed on those who expressed apprehensions of a different result, a striking diminution in the revenue actually occurred. Although any difference of opinion on a point of so much importance to the public faith was deeply regretted by the Department, yet it felt constrained, at that time, to regard many appearances of extraordinary prosperity as delusive; the existing surplus as temporary and fallacious in its character; and consequently believed that much of it was likely to be required in a few years to meet deficiencies in the revenue, arising from the progressive reduction of the tariff, and those fluctuations in income and expenditure to which all governments are more or less subject, and to which our own system of finance is peculiarly exposed.

Apart from the contingencies of war, and other exigencies affecting expenditure, it is impossible, under the ebbs and floods of trade and speculations of all kinds, which, with the present banking system, are as certain though not so regular as the tides, that a revenue derived chiefly from foreign importations and the sales of land, should not vibrate with such changes. The Department, therefore, has discharged a duty deemed imperative, in urging on the attention of Congress, at several sessions, some permanent and efficient arrangement for enabling the Treasury to meet such fluctuations without injury to the public credit.

On one occasion, permanent legislation in respect to this point did take place. But that has been repealed, or indefinitely postponed by the act of October 12, 1837; and the temporary measures substituted having nearly ceased their operation, the necessity for some further provision is apparent. The form seems to be the great question of difficulty; there being, it is apprehended, a general concurrence of views in favor of having some effectual provision on a subject of such obvious importance.

The investment of a part of the surplus in the Treasury in State stocks, in the manner which for several years has been successfully practiced, under the acts of Congress, as to large sums belonging to the Indians, so as to constitute a provident fund to meet contingencies and fluctuations, was the mode first recommended by the Department. But a substitute for this plan was preferred by Congress, which directed the whole surplus to be deposited with the States for safekeeping, and enabled the Secretary of the Treasury to recall it, whenever needed for public purposes. In the autumn of 1837, however, when the necessity of resorting to this substitute was in view, Congress postponed its operation. Instead of it, the power to issue Treasury notes for a limited period was granted, and for additional security against deficiencies, the deposit of the fourth installment with the States, was deferred till next January, and afterwards the power to sell the bonds of the United States Bank was added. But both of those powers will soon be inoperative, and without some further legislation on this subject, which shall be of an efficient character, and be available at an early day, the preservation of the public faith must be endangered.

Recent experience is full of admonition on this question. Since the extinguishment of the national debt, and especially within the last three years, it has been the policy of Congress to avoid a large balance in the Treasury immediately available, which, if unemployed for the public service, was regarded as taken from the circulation of the country, and in some degree hoarded, though deposited in banks which had made the public money the basis of enlarged operations. This policy, as it obviates the hazard attending such operations, as well as the imputation of improper influence in the management of the money, is certainly the most prudent. But the preservation of the public faith, either under the former practice of keeping the money in banks, or under the proposed system of an Independent Treasury, may occasionally render other resources necessary, from the considerable fluctuations which are frequently occurring in our receipts and expenditures from year to year, and even from month to month. Thus, the receipts from the usual sources, which were, in 1834, about twenty-one millions, rose unexpectedly in 1836 to $48,000,000; but fell again as suddenly in 1837 to only about nineteen millions. So the aggregate expenditures in 1834 and 1835, independent of any payments for trusts or the national debt, were only seventeen or eighteen millions; but from Indian wars and other causes they rapidly rose, and, notwithstanding the diminution in receipts, have remained since not far from thirty millions yearly. Again, in the month of January last, the expenditures were only about one million eight hundred thousand dollars; and in May last only $2,242,000; but in July they suddenly increased to over four million five hundred thousand dollars, being an excess, in a single month, of nearly two and a third millions, or more than enough to sweep off in thirty days the whole balance on hand. Consequently, at any period, with only a million or two in the Treasury, and the current receipts being less than two millions monthly, it is obvious that the public engagements could not all be punctually met, unless some power, like those before named, shall exist, to provide for calls so unequal in different portions of the year, as well as in different years. Though the receipts for any one year may be equal to the whole expenditures within it, even that will not remove the difficulty. The expenditures may be required in larger proportions in the first half of the year, and the greatest receipts occur in the last half.

Having the power to issue Treasury notes during 1838, the Department has been enabled, by the aid of that and other means, to meet every authorized engagement with punctuality. A power of a similar kind has been found in other countries, during more than a century, to be indispensable to sustain public credit. If we keep only a small available balance in the Treasury, and realize only the comparatively small income which is desirable since the discharge of the national debt, and this income shall continue to be affected by the periodical fluctuations of receipts which are probable under the changes going on in the tariff, as well as in banking and the habits of trade, this power, or some equivalent resource, seems to be essential to the support of the public faith in the scrupulous manner required by justice and sound policy.

The estimates of expenditures in 1839 have been formed on the most economical basis which the different Departments think the public interests will permit. They are less than those of either of the two preceding years; under many heads, and are several millions less than either the appropriations made by Congress in those years, or the expenditures actually paid within them. Judging from past experience alone, the probabilities would be that the appropriations to be made at the present session will exceed, by some millions, the estimates submitted.

But such additional appropriations, to any considerable extent, are not anticipated when the whole circumstances of the country, and of the Treasury, shall have been calmly reviewed by Congress. No doubt exists with the undersigned that prudence, at this time, requires a reduction, rather than an increase, in the aggregate of the annual appropriations. Besides what is dictated on this subject by a wise public frugality, and the straitened condition of the Treasury, it is probable that, by the gradual reduction in the tariff, which is in progress under the existing laws, the receipts from customs, which now average sixteen or seventeen millions yearly, will, by 1842, be so far diminished as not then to exceed ten or twelve millions. Hence, if the annual expenses do not by that period undergo a reduction in some degree corresponding, so as not to surpass that sum and the few additional millions which may then be derived from the sales of the public lands, an unpleasant resort to another increase of the tariff, or to a recall of deposits with the States, or to permanent loans, will then, if not sooner, become indispensable.

The further details connected with the diminution in our revenue by 1842, under the existing laws, were so fully exhibited in the annual report in 1835, that the undersigned forbears, on this occasion, to repeat them. But in commencing the unpleasant task of reduction in the expenditures, a question naturally arises as to what items it should first be applied. The Department would not be understood as urging retrenchment or parsimony, where the object is great, pressing, and constitutional. It has always approved not only those appropriations which are necessary to satisfy the ordinary wants of the public service, and others rendered proper to vindicate our rights and national character in war, but those which our unexampled increase in territory, numbers, and wealth, may have required, in order at all times to afford due protection to persons and property abroad, as well as at home, and discharge with efficiency all those momentous duties which have been clearly and wisely devolved on the Government of the Union. A judiciary for twenty-six instead of thirteen States must of course require more officers and expense. An army to guard an inland frontier of five thousand miles in extent, and embracing one million and a half of square miles of territory more than in 1789; and a navy to protect a sea-coast of over three thousand miles and a commerce of two millions of tonnage, instead of less than half a million, with annual imports and exports of nearly three hundred millions in value, instead of forty-three millions, must necessarily require a large addition to the public burdens. But, at the same time, some of these circumstances evince, with equal clearness, a flattering change in our ability to sustain those burdens.

This country is not, like most others, stationary, either in its fiscal wants or its fiscal means, but exhibits more clearly every year the interesting development of the wants and means of manhood, compared with those of infancy.

Besides the increased demands on the Treasury before mentioned, there has sprung up a light-house establishment, exceeding, in extent, that of any of the Powers in Europe, with a plan of river and harbor improvements, of constructing national roads, hospitals, mints, forts, arsenals, armories, navy-yards, docks, and various public edifices, in some degree suited to our present growth and necessities.

On the other hand, corresponding changes, equally great, in our resources, have fortunately occurred, and which last, whenever required by the public wants, have been displayed with great facility, as evinced in the increase of our annual revenues, from five to twenty and thirty million dollars. Those resources have enabled us not only to discharge all the augmented current expenditures, but to defray from one to two hundred millions of national debt incurred in defense of our liberties; extinguish the Indian title to the greater part of several new States, so as to extend the boundaries of civilization and christianity; and make a liberal deposit with all the States of a surplus in our income, exceeding twenty-eight million dollars. Hence the various officers, institutions, and departments, appropriate for administering the whole of the affairs, and in fine for executing the laws of the General Government in respect to sixteen instead of four millions of people are not so much just topics of complaint, as of admonition to increased caution in regulating establishments and expenditures necessarily so much enlarged. It is certain that some of them, however laudable in their origin, can be judiciously reduced as the advanced progress or completion of the business and works to which they relate, may sanction the measure. This would be sound economy; and its reasonableness should be duly appreciated by those who consume as well as those who pay the public revenue.

In the midst of fiscal operations so much greater in amount, and extended over a territory so much wider, none can be insensible to the further fact, that they open an avenue, which cannot be too closely guarded, to various excesses in expenses otherwise useful, and to numerous incidental charges which, though not dishonest, may, on scrutiny, be found neither necessary nor useful. All these will demand untiring watchfulness, or their accumulation must prevent those reductions which it is believed the public service can, in many cases, bear without injury; which comport with the economical principles always to be cherished in republican forms of government; which the frugal and virtuous habits of the great mass of our population demand; and which are deemed essential to avoid embarrassment in the present and approaching condition of the public income.

The system of internal improvements is, for instance, voluntary, but very expensive, and the growth almost entirely of the last thirteen years. So is a large part of our light-house establishment and fortifications.

Does not true wisdom require reductions and postponements in appropriations towards these objects, at least till the revenue of the country shall again clearly indicate the safety and convenience of pushing them with more vigor.

In the prospective state of the finances, ought not numerous donations to local projects, which have of late years been so common, to be likewise forborne?

Our pension grants, which are in a great degree gratuitous, exceed in expense annually what was the whole yearly cost of the General Government, independent of the public debt, from 1789 to 1799. However generous, therefore, and grateful, and often just, may have been the feelings which led to their increase in times of a great and increasing revenue, does not prudence teach us to exercise caution in making further additions to them, while the tariff is undergoing a gradual reduction?

These suggestions might be extended to other matters of a similar character; but enough has been specified to attract attention to the subject generally. The amount of receipts and expenditures depending on the laws and the condition of the country, and not on this Department, the latter can only recommend measures which appear suitable in relation to them. Having done this on the present subject, it cheerfully leaves their adoption or rejection where it properly belongs—to the superior wisdom and experience of Congress.

VII.—ON THE KIND OF CURRENCY RECEIVED FOR THE PUBLIC DUES, AND THE RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS BY THE BANKS.

The two circulars annexed contain all the instructions which have been issued by this Department concerning the currency receivable for public dues, since the passage of the resolution of Congress on that subject in May last, and the act of July 5, 1838. Previously, the notes of specie paying banks, as well as specie and Treasury notes, were permitted to be taken for duties, but only the last two for lands. A great part of the actual receipts, however, for both duties and lands, was in specie and Treasury notes. Since those instructions were given, more than half of the receipts for duties has consisted of notes of specie paying banks. Most of those for lands continue to be as before.

The kind of currency that should be taken for the public dues has, heretofore, been fully discussed by this Department, and as the views then presented remain unchanged, it is not proposed, at this time, to enlarge on any former suggestions.

But what currency it is the most proper to encourage for private as well as public purposes, is a topic intimately connected with the recent resumption of specie payments.

Both these matters have of late had a highly important bearing on our financial operations; and the striking contrast between the state of the country in 1814, and its condition in 1837, in recovering from the suspensions of specie payments which occurred in those years, furnishes so instructive a lesson on the subjects before mentioned, as to justify and require a few details in connection with them.

At the former period, there were only about seventeen millions of specie in the United States, whether in banks or in active circulation. This sum would average but two dollars to each individual of our population at that time. Small bills were receivable in almost every State and by the General Government. Such being the amount of specie and the condition of the currency, the Government felt compelled to acquiesce in the impolitic, as well as unjust, reception of depreciated paper of all kinds for public dues; and the suspension of specie payments, always calamitous however short, was protracted nearly three years. It was then terminated only by great personal sacrifices, by numerous insolvencies, and, as many have supposed, by the cooperation of a new national bank, which its friends established under the belief of its utility, if not necessity, to effect the accomplishment of that object.

But, in 1837, the condition of the currency had become materially changed. There were about eighty millions of specie in the country, equal to about five dollars per head of our population, or more than double the former average.

It had been thus increased; principally, by the firm and persevering policy of the General Government, during the last four years, to discourage the use of small notes, and introduce gold more extensively into the currency.

In this state of things, the public officers at once declined to violate the laws and countenance partiality among debtors, by receiving depreciated paper, and that of very different values, for public dues. Without hesitation, they also refused unjustly to abandon the specie standard of value, either as to payments or receipts; and hence sustained, throughout, both that standard and the uniformity in imposts so wisely established by the Constitution.

This step tended strongly to encourage a resumption of specie payments, and, in consequence of it, and of other measures about to be explained, the suspension, though it was more general than the former one, ceased in some places within less than a year, and has already ended in most parts of the Union without any aid from the dangerous and overshadowing influence of a National Bank. The essential difference in the course which the public officers were able to pursue, as to the kind of money received, and the earlier period and greater ease of resuming specie payments, bear no unequivocal testimony to the wisdom of the policy which had previously been adopted in relation to the improvement of the currency.

It is believed that about seven hundred banks and branches, situated in twenty-two States and Territories, have already resumed specie payments. These, including not far from thirty which never suspended, make seven hundred and thirty now paying specie. Seventy more are expected to resume on or before the first of the ensuing month. Of the residue, amounting to about twenty-five, with a capital of from three to four millions, it is believed that six or eight are winding up their concerns, because unprofitable; and that the rest are insolvent.

Soon after the suspension, this Department urged the deposit banks to use their utmost efforts to resume specie payments at an early day.

It was pressed that each, as an act of sound policy, no less than of strong moral obligation and imperative duty under the laws, should resume specie payments the moment it was able safely to effect them, or, at least, that all the banks in particular neighborhoods, cities, counties, and States, should unite in doing this, whenever able, without waiting for weaker institutions, or more embarrassed regions of the country.

The adoption of that course in some States, however much the measure was questioned at the time, and perseveringly opposed by many banks as well as influential individuals, has proved fortunate, and reflects great credit on the sagacity, firmness, and intelligence of those who adopted it. The encouragement given by the Department to such institutions as resumed specie payments, by taking no paper but theirs for public dues, and by preferring them in the transaction of public business, was not without salutary influence. Suits against the banks in default, unless apparently insolvent, were also forborne, and drafts continued, with great advantage, to be issued gradually on all that were disposed to make satisfactory arrangements with the public creditors, and thus lessen those large immediate liabilities which stood in the way of early resumption.

Indeed, every facility was promised and extended which the limited power of the Department permitted, and, on its recommendation, further measures of reasonable indulgence to the merchants and banks indebted to the Government received the prompt attention of Congress, and, doubtless, contributed much to shorten the suspension.

Under the laws granting such indulgence, the aggregate of merchants' bonds, the payment of which was postponed, is supposed to have reached between four and five million dollars. The chief benefit of this measure was felt in the Atlantic section of the country, while a similar extent of relief was experienced principally in the west and southwest by the allowance to the banks of a long delay in paying the balances due from them. The curtailment of paper issues, which was urged by this Department in 1836 as indispensable to prevent impending disasters, and in 1837 as equally indispensable to remove them and restore specie payments, has, since their suspension, equaled at least thirty million dollars. Another striking fact is, that the curtailment was most rapid and thorough in those sections of the country where the resumption of specie payments first took place, and the exchanges were first equalized. The difference is believed to be still more striking between May, 1837, and May, 1838. Nor has this event been accompanied, as many predicted, by any ruinous fall in the prices of labor, or of our great staple commodities. As a further illustration of some of the real causes and cures of the embarrassments in the currency, it is computed that, within a year from the suspension, a reduction was effected in bank discounts exceeding forty million dollars; that there was an increase of the whole amount of specie in the country of five million dollars; and that the aggregate at this time must be from eighty-five to ninety million dollars. The official returns of the imports and exports of gold and silver during the year ending September 30, 1838, are given in the table annexed; and the former in that time will be found to exceed the latter more than fourteen millions.

Intimately connected with the currency and the suspension of specie payments is the condition of the domestic exchanges during the past year, as compared with some former periods. Although in 1825 a national bank had been in full operation for several years, and in 1819 for two years, those exchanges were then quite as much deranged between most places as in 1837. But of late they have improved more rapidly than in the two former periods, without receiving any aid from new banking incorporations by the General Government.

This fact demonstrates that the great nominal difference in exchanges at both periods, has been produced by circumstances over which national legislation possesses but little influence.

When excesses of indebtedness, or other commercial causes, render money more desirable in one place than another, then, and not till then, the legitimate difference in exchanges begins; and that difference can never be corrected by banks or legislation, but only by the great laws of trade changing the relative indebtedness and demand.

But when a nominal difference in domestic exchanges occurs, extending beyond two or three per cent., or the small actual cost of transporting specie to the most distant cities in the Union, it is the consequence, not of an unequal indebtedness alone, but of that and an unequal quality or value in the local bank currency; and which event has been produced, and can be removed, only by measures operating on the soundness of that currency. Each State has in its own power an effectual remedy for any suffering by high exchanges from this source. Independent, and true to its vital interests, it can always adopt such effectual regulations in banking, as will remove the scourge of a depreciated paper, and thus avert any ruinous rate of domestic exchange.

From the whole of these considerations, it is manifest that the recent resumption of specie payments, and the equalization of exchanges, have both been facilitated by the large amount of specie which has of late years been introduced, and the course of policy pursued in other respects by the General Government on topics connected with the circulating medium and the banks.

A restoration of equality in the foreign exchanges also, and a perseverance in extinguishing old debts, with increased forbearance to contract new ones, either at home or abroad, have revived that foreign confidence which had been withdrawn with such disastrous precipitation. These favorable changes, united with a diminution in speculations, whether in banks, lands, or commerce, and a return to stricter frugality in individual expenses, and to more industrious energies for a livelihood, have aided good crops, and some minor agencies, in bringing about, with greater rapidity, events the most desirable, and a condition of the country highly auspicious. In many quarters, money has become comparatively abundant, interest lower, and trade and manufactures active.

Nothing more seems to be necessary to perpetuate the present healthy action of the currency, except a rigid adherence to the system of policy which, by honest and resolute efforts, has produced the improvement. It cannot but be wise in respect to the circulating medium for the General Government to persevere in a course which prepared the country better to meet, and quickly carried it through, so fearful a crisis. It would seem prudent, likewise, for the States, profiting by past experience, to insist on reform in their banking institutions, and particularly on greater self-denial in their business, by imposing additional checks on over-issues, and stronger limitations to excessive discounts. The present system, if unchecked, has inherent defects of an alarming character; and, without indulging in timid misgivings or unjust suspicions, it may be said to tend, by its expansions and inevitable contractions, to unsettle, frequently, the value of labor as well as of the whole property of the country.

The General and State Governments might, also, with manifest advantage, abstain from applying any stimulants to the overaction of all kinds, that, under such specious but treacherous hopes, deluded so many into the recent embarrassments.

This would not evince any hostility either to banks or to credit, when well secured and properly regulated; but would serve to avert ruin from both.

Several of the banks, which are under the control of real capitalists and officers of prudence and foresight, have become satisfied that the use of the public money for discounts, subject to the restrictions of the present deposit act, and the liabilities to refund it suddenly, which must exist with a small balance in the Treasury, is attended with much inconvenience, and is likely, in the end, to prove more injurious than profitable to the banks and their borrowers, as well as to the Government. So widely impressed has this conviction become, that some of those institutions have declined to receive public deposits under the special provisions of that act.

VIII.—ON THE MANNER OF KEEPING THE PUBLIC MONEY, AND THE CHANGES PROPOSED.

The present laws in regard to the keeping of the public money are defective in several particulars, which were explained in the last two reports on the finances.

The full advantages, either of the system of State banks or the proposed one of an Independent Treasury, are not now enjoyed; while the Department, without all the securities which are practicable, is subjected to some of the inconveniences and many of the risks attending both.

The measures it would recommend as most suitable to remove the various imperfections which exist on this subject, have been so recently and fully explained, that a reconsideration of them all, at this time, cannot be regarded as necessary.

It is deemed proper, however, to communicate to Congress such details as are material for understanding with accuracy the mode in which the public money is now kept, and for appreciating duly the importance of those additional checks and securities which, though proposed as a part of the plan for an independent Treasury, appear to be imperatively required under any system.

Four of the six banks reported at the last session of Congress, as retained under the deposit act of June 23, 1836, still continue to be general depositories. Of the other two, the People's Bank at Bangor, and the Louisville Savings Institution, the former has surrendered its charter, and the latter, having declined the general trust, is now employed merely for special deposits. The names of the four banks retained are annexed, with the amounts in each, subject to draft on the 1st instant, and their condition generally. Collectors and receivers residing near to those institutions, have continued to deposit in them as formerly. Drafts are seldom made directly on officers so situated, nor are any considerable amounts of public money long retained by them. At points where other general depositories were needed, the Department has not yet been able to complete arrangements with any banks, which were both competent and willing to be selected under the specific provisions of the deposit act.

In many of these last cases, therefore, the practice has been to leave the public money with the officers collecting it, to be held in their own custody, or placed in special deposit in banks, during the short period which might elapse before it was wanted and drawn from them by drafts in favor of the public creditors.

A list of the collectors and receivers from whom the money has generally been so drawn, and who had any amounts on hand subject to draft the 1st instant, is annexed.

The rest of those classes of officers, who have collected funds beyond the sums needed to defray their current expenditures, and who were not conveniently situated to conform to either of the above arrangements, have been required to make deposits of the same in banks to the special credit of the Treasurer.

Other funds received from the exchange of Treasury notes, from collections by attorneys and marshals, from patent fees and miscellaneous sources, have also, in most instances, been placed in banks to the credit of the Treasurer, in special deposit, except such amounts as could advantageously be put into the Mint and its branches, for the only two purposes authorized in the laws on that subject.

An exhibit is presented of the names of these special depositories, with the sums in each. The amounts retained in the Mint and its branches, under the provisions of those laws, are subjoined.

In the absence of suitable general depositories, some money due from certain State banks has been allowed to remain in deposit to the special credit of the Treasurer till it was wanted for public payments; they being, under all the circumstances, considered proper depositories for that temporary purpose. A schedule of these banks, with the sums remaining in each subject to draft at the last returns, is annexed.

But this system of special deposits, or of deposits to the special credit of the Treasurer, has, from convenience, and indeed almost from necessity, not generally corresponded with the usual forms of special deposits.

A moment's reflection will show that any deposit not subject to be paid out by the banks in the absence of the depositor, though at times convenient for officers living near banks, would cause much inconvenience to those residing remote from them; and that the making of frequent disbursements from it, by the latter, would be utterly impracticable. The Treasurer, in common practice, should retain his funds only in such condition as will allow them to be paid out promptly on the numerous drafts which must be made in favor of claimants in every section of the country. For this purpose, when a deposit of them is made, it must be general, or, if special, it must be with an understanding or contract, not only that they are to be ready for his call at all times and under all circumstances, but that they are to be paid out on his various drafts, without his actual presence.

From these details it is apparent that the present system of keeping the public money is very complicated, and it may be deemed fortunate that the Department has been able, during the past year, to conduct large financial operations under it without great public inconvenience. Few persons can doubt that some change in the laws on this subject is proper. But whatever plan Congress may adopt, too great care cannot be exercised in providing the best possible securities. All those additional guards against defaults, which have been urgently recommended in the last two reports on the finances, or incorporated into the bill to establish an Independent Treasury, are considered important. Recent experience in respect to the benefits of only ordinary collateral security evinces the utility of such measures.

Thus the losses expected to be sustained from deposit banks since 1834, are very small in comparison with those sustained between that period and 1817. This, in a considerable degree, is to be attributed to the additional requirements of such security.

The improvement was voluntarily introduced by the Department in 1833, and was afterwards sanctioned by Congress in the deposit act of 1836.

The measure insured greater care in the management of the banks, and an increased watchfulness by the sureties in times of difficulty, to take efficient steps to indemnify the Treasury.

With a view to illustrate further the effects of requiring collateral security, in cases both of banks and collecting officers, as well as to communicate interesting facts in connection with the safety of keeping the public money from the foundation of the Government, several tabular statements, prepared by the Department, are herewith presented.

First. A list of the banks still indebted to the United States, for defaults previous to the close of 1834, none of which are believed to have given, originally, any collateral security, is annexed. The whole amount now due, without computing interest, equals $1,000,676; and a great part of this must be regarded as a total loss.

Second. Another list of indebted banks is annexed, most of which gave collateral security. The remaining dues from them to the Treasurer, on defaults accruing between 1834 and October, 1837, though at first very large, have been reduced to about two million four hundred thousand dollars; and most, if not all, of these debts, with some others, owing to public disbursing officers, for money on deposit, it is confidently expected will in the end be paid.

The first installment due from those which have since executed other bonds and given new security, under the act of October, 1837, has been promptly met, and portions of the second have already been advanced by some of them. Suits are pending against only two on account of their liabilities.

Third. The eventual losses sustained from receivers and collectors, while, as a part of the bank deposit system, they were collecting the public funds, to be afterwards placed for safe-keeping in banks, were, at the last session, estimated at a sum ranging from nine to twelve hundred thousand dollars. (See printed report to House of Representatives, 28th February, 1838, No. 101.)

Collateral security had generally been taken of these officers; but in former times it was not always in so large amounts and with so great care as of late, and consequently most of the foregoing losses happened many years ago.

A list of all those officers who, on the 12th of October, 1837, the time designated in the resolution of the House of Representatives, stood on the books of the Treasury, as having neglected to settle their accounts in season, may be seen, with the amount charged to each, in the printed report made on the 15th of January last, (document No. 111.) But several of these were not then actually indebted to the United States, though, having neglected to adjust their accounts at the Treasury, they came within the express words of the resolution, and consequently were included. Some defaults have occurred, or been discovered since October, 1837; but it is not apprehended that any losses will ultimately be sustained from them, except in the case of the former collector of New York. That case has been recently detected, and the defalcations are supposed to have been continued for many years, and to have reached a large amount. From their character, they could, perhaps, have been effectually prevented only by penalties for false returns, a system of cash duties, and personal inspections of money and vouchers, with punishments for misuse of the public funds, similar to what was urged in the report from this Department on the finances in September, 1837. It is intended to make the particulars of this case the subject of a special report to the President, for the consideration of Congress.

The requirement of collateral bonds has undoubtedly diminished many of the losses before mentioned. But notwithstanding every precaution and security heretofore in force, the whole of these defaults, whether by collectors, receivers, or banks, have occurred under the old systems of making deposits in a United States bank or State banks for safe custody.

Under either of those systems, if unreformed, Congress must continue to employ officers to collect the public money, as well as banks to keep it after collected, with all the former risks and probable losses incident to both classes of agents. But the proposed plan of an Independent Treasury, with all its checks and guards, will diminish the number of risks, and tend, in several respects, to strengthen the public security. By requiring the officers now employed in collections to hold most of the money for a time in deposit, it adopts only a part of the agents under either of the former systems; and hence, dispensing with the banks, unless it may be for a few strictly special deposits, avoids most, if not all, of the risks and losses which have been sustained from that class of agents.

It is true that under this plan it is contemplated to impose on collecting officers the duty of keeping somewhat longer, in a few cases, and in sums somewhat larger in others, the money which under the other systems since 1789, those officers have collected; and three or four new offices are proposed to be established, to hold general receipts in deposit at a few central points. These changes are all the material ones which have been recommended on this point. But, to increase the public security under all duties new or old, as well as those of any new agents, ample bonds are to be required, occasional examinations of their funds and accounts, of a new and rigorous character, introduced; the use of the former strictly prohibited; and new and severe penalties should be imposed on fraud, falsehood in returns, and embezzlements, by rendering them penitentiary offenses.

Honest diligence can never suffer by these changes, while carelessness in business and laxity of principle will be prevented, or exposed and properly rebuked.

Additional safeguards like these are also of vital importance in a moral view, by more effectually preventing as well as punishing wrong.

They are, therefore, earnestly urged again on the consideration of Congress. Whether looking to further security or other important ends, one of the most desirable alterations, which is incorporated into the plan of an independent Treasury, provides that any use of the public money for private purposes be hereafter considered illegal, and punished as a dangerous breach of trust. The experience of the last few years demonstrates the propriety of such an organic change of our system, whoever and whatever may be the fiscal agents employed. The change, so far as respects mere collecting or disbursing officers, will have a decisive tendency to preserve not only the Government, but them and their securities, from those losses which it was never contemplated they should hazard, by making loans or speculations with funds held in sacred trust for purposes entirely public in their character, and constant in their demands. Had such a provision been adopted early in our legislation, doubtless it would have prevented most, if not all, of the losses heretofore sustained from those classes of officers, and much wretchedness which has befallen both principals and sureties. Some of the earliest acts of Congress wisely prevented officers of the customs and of the Treasury Department from being concerned in commerce, or dealing in the public lands or public stocks. These restrictions were doubtless introduced chiefly with a view to remove the temptation and hazard incident to the possession of the public money. But the prohibition to employ that money for private purposes, under severe penalties, has not yet been introduced, except in substance in the Mint, by making embezzlements there punishable as felonies. Its expediency has been urged by the Department heretofore, and seems confirmed by experience, as well as theory. The success of such a provision in the Mint, where no losses, from its establishment to the present moment, have for so many years, and after having the custody of so many millions of money, been known to occur, is a very striking illustration of its efficacy.

Finding that no new act on this and some similar points was passed by Congress at its late session, a circular, bearing on them, was issued by this Department soon after the adjournment, a copy of which is annexed.

In regard to deposit agents, heretofore consisting chiefly of banks, the change from former usages, which would be introduced by such a prohibition, would be greater. But the present condition of the Treasury and of the country is highly auspicious for the reform. Diminished as is the balance of the public money now on hand, and manifest as is the policy of the Government to keep it so hereafter, the apparent pecuniary disadvantage caused either to the banks or their customers would be slighter than at any former period.

In the mean time, and under the speculating mania of the age, the alteration would yield a most valuable protection against the recurrence of disastrous adventures, so far as stimulated by the more easy loans of such funds through bank depositories, and against the consequent losses to the institutions themselves, as well as bankruptcies and misery to numerous individuals.

Above all other considerations in favor of this change, if we advert to sound views in political economy, will be its influence in removing every temptation to the dangerous disposition to increase taxes or revenue on account of their incidental use for assistance and capital in private enterprises. It would also restore official practice to the true theory of the Constitution, which, in its primitive purity, must undoubtedly have intended that the public money should be collected solely for public purposes, and should be kept, not for the emolument of individuals or corporations, but for the single object of meeting, with promptitude and fidelity, the obligations of the Government.

Originally, the departure in practice from this theory was not, in any case, even in implied terms, allowed by Congress. It was permitted only by early construction of the Treasury Department; and, in relation to deposit banks alone, for the benefit, through them, of the mercantile interest, which constituted their principal customers and owners. But since the extinguishment of the national debt, and the accumulation of large balances in the Treasury, this departure has been expressly sanctioned by Congress in the deposit act of 1836, and has tended, very undesignedly, without doubt, to place the Government in the invidious attitude of a great money lender of its current funds, rather than of a surplus, and that for the apparent benefit, not of public bodies, such as States, or of all persons equally, but of particular corporations and particular classes of society immediately connected with them. Besides this, the public servants, however scrupulous, have thus become exposed to the grossest imputations of favoritism, partiality, and corruption in making these indirect loans. A radical change in the system, in this respect, is, therefore, very desirable; and, by preventing any individual or corporate employment of the public money, would render both the possession and the superintendence of it, which are now objects of just jealousy, but mere naked powers, and, by their great responsibility, dangerous only to their possessors. They would become entirely useless for either political influence or private emolument, and could contribute nothing to the depraved appetite of the age for power and speculation.

But important as are the eventual safety of the public money and purity of character in its management, it must be manifest, from the remarks already made, and from the warning events of the last two years, that legislation should look, not only to them, but much further.

Recent occurrences have shown that the whole treasure of the United States, when intrusted to banks, is liable, in critical periods, to be swept at once from the use and control of the General Government.

The good faith of our Union may thus be suddenly placed in extreme jeopardy. Indeed, it will be fortunate if the accumulated ills of a broken public credit throughout the land are not actually added, and are not visited on the labor and pursuits of the whole people. It follows, therefore, though banking institutions have never been regarded by the undersigned as a class of agents generally unsafe, when looking to eventual losses, and though the additional securities and prohibitions before mentioned might be incorporated into some system of banks, but with less facility than into the plan of an independent Treasury, that the great and widespread danger experienced of late from the employment of banks as fiscal depositories, is one which ought, if possible, to be avoided. Arising, as it does, from their liability to a general suspension of specie payments, the individual officers who hold money on deposit are exposed to no such calamity; and when the recent suspension happened, the specie in the possession of many of them proved exceedingly seasonable and useful in discharging the public obligations, in the manner imperatively required by law. Though an apparent security against some of the mortifying embarrassments, resulting from such a general suspension, might be obtained by adopting a system of special deposits, yet, in order to render such deposits convenient in fiscal operations, the banks must, as heretofore explained, have access to the funds, and be tempted in an emergency to use them. The changes which have been proposed in keeping the public money by an independent Treasury would entirely obviate most of these dangers.

If individual agents were chiefly employed, if the several checks and securities proposed were adopted, and if the use of the public money for private purposes were prohibited, under severe penalties, and must concede that there would be much less tendency to any of the evils heretofore described, and none to the greatest of all disasters in fiscal agents—a general refusal to meet their liabilities in a legal manner.

No cause either for special favor or hostility between the banks and the Government would then exist. Without any alliance, offensive or defensive between them, an appropriate and occasional use would still be made of the banks by the Treasury, as is done by others, whenever convenience should require it. But neither party would be forced into a species of vassalage; a constant, necessary, and dependent connection, which, in the recent crisis, has been found not only perilous to public credit, but derogatory to one of the parties, and subjecting both to continued imputations of those unworthy influences so disreputable to the community as well as the Government.

On the whole, it is apparent that the system of an independent Treasury is more plain and simple in its arrangements than any other, and much more accordant with that originally in use after the adoption of the Constitution.

It is truer to the spirit of that sacred instrument, and those elementary self-sustaining principles which belong to an independent Government.

It is more free from several formidable dangers; and, under the additional guards and restrictions proposed, is likely to unite all attainable security, with efficiency and purity, in the custody of the public funds.

In fine, experience has furnished satisfactory proof that the collecting officers can, in most places, keep and disburse as well as collect the public dues, without great inconvenience; and that the exclusive employment of banks as deposit agents, though not regarded as comparatively unsafe in relation to eventual payment, has proved embarrassing and dangerous in other respects, and is unnecessary, provided a few additional receivers, and the additional regulations, checks, and securities, which have been urged in respect to collecting officers, are adopted.

IX.—ON SEVERAL MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS.

Separate reports will soon be made on various other matters of public interest confided to the charge of this Department.

These will include one on the progress made in the manufacture of weights and measures, and their distribution among the different States and custom-houses, as well as on the important survey of the Atlantic coast of the United States. Another will be submitted on the erection and discontinuance of light-houses; and others on the affairs of the General Land Office, and the Mint and its branches.

Since last December, the sixth installment due from France, and the fifth from Naples, for indemnities, after being punctually paid, have been transferred to this country and distributed among the claimants. Notice has also been recently received, that the arrearages of interest due from France upon the first four installments have been paid, and the amount, exceeding a million francs, will forthwith be adjusted with those entitled to it.

The Smithsonian legacy, amounting to more than half a million dollars, has been received and invested. For particulars, reference can be had to a special report, which will be made to the President and laid before Congress, under a resolution of the House of Representatives.

At an early day it is intended to submit to that House a valuable collection of facts, in compliance with its resolution calling for information concerning the number of steamboats, locomotives, and other machinery moved by steam within the United States, as well as the causes of the explosion in steam-boilers, and various matters connected with that interesting subject.

Such other questions of minor importance as have been referred to this office will be answered as early as practicable.

It is hoped that the undersigned will not be regarded as too importunate, if he again expresses an earnest desire for a reorganization of the Treasury Department.

With some slight changes, rendered proper by new legislation since 1835, the less complex and more efficient system at that time recommended in a separate report, would be a great improvement.

That portion of it proposing a separation of the duties of Commissioner of the Customs from those of comptrolling accounts, and requiring the undivided attention of one bureau to each subject, is of the most pressing importance, and would greatly conduce to promptitude, exactness, and skill, in the respective business of each.

An alteration in the commencement of the fiscal year, and a revision of the number and compensation of custom-house officers, and also of several laws connected with the collection of the imposts, are measures still as desirable as when they were heretofore submitted to the consideration of Congress. Some legal provision on the subject of return duties, regulating the manner of keeping them while under protest, and the mode of repayment, is necessary to remove doubts and promote the public security. The employment of more boys in the merchant service is, in some degree, connected with the customs, on account of its tendency to afford additional protection to the lives and property engaged in commerce, as well as to improve the morals of mariners, and prevent smuggling, mutinies, and piracies.

The encouragement by law of such an acquisition to the marine of our country, by soon bringing into active usefulness a class of intelligent, virtuous, and able seamen, would tend materially to avert some of the numerous evils from that quarter, which now bear upon commercial energy and prosperity.

Respectfully, yours,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

The President of the Senate of the United States.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, in pursuance of notice given yesterday, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, gave notice that tomorrow he would ask leave to bring in the following bills:

A bill for the relief of the heirs of John Brahan, late receiver of public moneys at Huntsville, Alabama; and

A bill for the relief of William Jones.

Mr. CRITTENDEN gave notice that tomorrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Pierre Menard and others.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUBBARD offered the following resolution; which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the 34th rule of the Senate be so far suspended that the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall appoint for the present session the members of all the standing committees, with the exception of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce; and that the Senate shall, previous to any such appointment, elect by ballot the chairman of that committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN suggested that the balloting should take place now; which being assented to, the Senate went into a ballot, which resulted as follows: W. R. King, 23; scattering, 3.

A quorum not having voted, the Senate proceeded to a second ballot; which resulted as follows: W. R. King, 26; scattering, 1.

Mr. KING was therefore duly elected.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of Jedediah Hunt, a captain in the Army during the late war, asking arrearages of pension; laid on the table.

CHAPLAINS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GARLAND, their Clerk, stating that they had passed a joint resolution for the appointment of two chaplains, of different denominations, one for each House, to interchange weekly, and asking the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolution was read and concurred in.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 5, 1838.

Hon. L. SALTONSTALL, member elect from the State of Massachusetts, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, inclosing, in pursuance of the law establishing the Treasury Department, accurate copies of the accounts kept in that Department for the past year.

Also, a communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, inclosing a report of the contingent expenditures of his office for the past year.

Also, from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, containing copies of all contracts entered into by that office for the past year.

The above were all severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF HON. WILLIAM PATTERSON.

Mr. FILLMORE rose and said: Mr. Speaker, the painful and melancholy duty has devolved upon me of announcing to this House the death of my lamented friend and colleague, WILLIAM PATTERSON. He died at his residence, in Warsaw, on the 14th day of August last.

The last time I saw him was in this Hall, at the close of the late session. He was then in the prime of life, and apparently in the full enjoyment of health. Blessed by his Creator with a constitution that never felt disease, envied by a temperance and regularity of habit that ordinarily bids defiance to its approach, no man left this House with fairer prospects of returning to it again. But the untiring assiduity with which he devoted himself to the discharge of his duties here during that long and arduous session, doubtless sowed the seeds of that disease which so soon terminated his earthly existence. Beneath the external glow of health that then mantled his cheek was insidiously preying the canker worm of death. He was barely enabled to return to the bosom of his family when his strength gave way, his reason wandered, and, in a few short days, all that was mortal of WILLIAM PATTERSON "slept beneath the clods of the valley." Would that this melancholy tale ended here. But it does not. The partner of his earthly joys and sorrows, worn down with the watchings and anxieties of his last illness, with a constitution too feeble to support the accumulated distress of a sensitive mind, sunk beneath the weight of her sorrows, and, in a few days after his interment, she, too, "slept the sleep of death" by his side. What an appalling bereavement to his infant children! They are now orphans in this wide world, exhibiting in their changed condition an awful reality of the uncertainty of life and of all earthly enjoyments.

But, sir, though gone, he has left behind him a name and reputation dear to them that knew him. Modest and unassuming in his character, kind and generous in his disposition, honest and inflexible in his purpose, to know him was to respect and esteem him. His heart was without guile; and, though he made no professions, yet he habitually practiced all the virtues that adorn the life of a most exemplary Christian.

He made no pretensions to literary acquisitions or statesmanlike qualifications, and his native modesty naturally induced him to seek the quiet retirement of private life. But, blessed with good sense and a strong and retentive memory, he found leisure, amid the daily toils of a laborious occupation, to cultivate a taste for reading, which stored his mind with useful facts. At the unsolicited request of his fellow-citizens, he reluctantly yielded his assent to occupy a seat on this floor. How he discharged that important trust, during the short time he participated in our deliberations, is known to you all. During a protracted and uncommonly arduous session, when many fainted by the wayside, he was always at his post. During a time of uncommon excitement and political acrimony, he was firm in the support of what he deemed to be right, yet tolerant to the opinions of others with whom he differed. In one word, he was constant and patient in the discharge of all his official duties, and untiring in the more humble but useful labors of his station. Naturally frank, honest, and confiding, he drew around him a circle of friends, and by the unadulterated goodness of his heart, disarmed even political opposition of its rancor. Finally, in all the relations of life, as a father, husband, brother, friend, citizen, and legislator, he was blameless. That no testimony of respect for his many virtues may be wanting, I offer for the adoption of the House the resolutions which I send to the Chair:

Resolved, unanimously, That this House has received with deep sensibility the annunciation of the death of Hon. WILLIAM PATTERSON, a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of the deceased by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

DEATH OF HON. A. W. BRUYN.

Mr. GRAY then rose, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely join in the expression of sorrow at the decease of our late lamented friend and colleague, whose death we have just heard announced, and sympathize with his relatives, and especially his children, who have suffered a double bereavement; and regret—yes, sir, deeply regret—that there is still yet to be announced another instance of mortality, which occurred during the recess of Congress, among the delegation from that State; and that, too, from the district which I have the honor in part to represent. I allude to the late Hon. ANDREW DE WITT BRUYN, who, for a considerable period prior to, and during all the time he served his constituents in this body, suffered under a combination of diseases that impaired his usefulness here, and finally terminated his life on the 27th day of July last, at his residence in Ithaca. Aside from the irreparable loss which his family have sustained, the death of Judge Bruyn is regarded as no ordinary calamity to the community to whom he was intimately known, and by whom his salutary influence, both in public and private life, was felt and appreciated. In all situations in life he was amiable and unpretending; deliberate in forming his opinions, and inflexible in maintaining them. He was, in all respects, an honorable man; justly, and in a very high degree, enjoying the esteem of all who knew him; and those who knew him best respected him most. He was a lawyer of eminence, distinguished for the clear and comprehensive view he took of all subjects presented for his consideration, possessing talents peculiarly fitting for a judicial station; and, after a successful practice in his profession for many years, he received the appointment of first judge of the county court in the county where he resided, the duties of which he discharged for several years, and until he was elected to a seat in this body, with distinguished ability; and when he resigned to enter upon his duties here, he received the unanimous and cordial approbation of the bar of his county, and those whose peculiar province it was to join in an expression of his valuable services in that capacity. Of his course here, it is only necessary to remark that he acquired a reputation here, which he maintained elsewhere, of a pure, upright, and honest man.

I beg leave to send to the Chair the following resolution, and move its adoption:

Resolved, That the members of this House tender to the relatives of the deceased their sympathy on this mournful event, and will testify their respect for the memory of ANDREW DE WITT BRUYN, deceased, late member of this House from the State of New York, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

And then, on motion, the House adjourned.

appropriation sufficient to complete the construction of the Cumberland road to the Mississippi river, or to Jefferson City, Missouri; the appropriation, when made, to be paid over to the several States within whose limits the road is situate, in annual installments: Provided, The States will agree to accept and apply the money to the objects intended, and discharge the General Government from any further appropriations: And provided also, That the States have authority to collect toll on said road sufficient to keep the same in good repair after its completion, and allow the arms and munitions of war of the General Government to pass the same toll free.

By Mr. NORVELL:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the district judge of the United States for the district of Michigan.

By Mr. HUBBARD:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the acts of Congress granting pensions for disabilities incurred during the last war, so as to have the pensions of such invalids commence at the time their disability was received.

Agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to Lemuel White, of Vermont, a soldier of the Revolution.

Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Lemuel White and John McNeil, on the files of the last session, be again referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the memorial of Commodore James Barron, laid on the table yesterday, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, the petition of Jedediah Hunt, laid on the table yesterday, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the finances, together with the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the same subject, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to commerce, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the Post Office and post roads be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to naval affairs be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the public lands be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. WALL, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the Judiciary be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the militia be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned over until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 6, 1838.

The first business in order was the motion made on Monday by Mr. CRARY, and postponed till this day, that J. W. Dorr, Delegate from Wisconsin, be qualified.

Mr. MERCER, on whose motion it had been postponed, said, with a view to the action of the proper committee upon the subject, which would probably be announced on Monday, he would move a further postponement till that day.

Mr. SERGEANT remarked that, as there was but one return before the House, he could not perceive the necessity of deferring the subject at all.

Mr. JONES, the contestant Delegate, expressed a hope that the House would allow him an opportunity of presenting a reply to a paper that had been laid on their tables from his opponent. He trusted, too, that it would go to the Committee of Elections, though he himself was then prepared to go into the question.

Mr. SERGEANT would not interpose an objection if the gentleman solicited delay to prepare his views.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, it was Ordered, That the several standing committees be now appointed in pursuance of the rules and orders of the House.

On motion of Mr. ALLAN, of Vermont, it was

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House furnish the members thereof with the usual plan of the Hall showing the seat of each member.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. DROMGOOLE submitted the following; which, under the rules, lies over one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House: Insert between the 10th and 11th rules, "in all cases of election by the House the vote shall be taken via voce."

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ADAMS, pursuant to notice, introduced a bill to prohibit the giving or accepting, in the District of Columbia, of a challenge to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof; which was read twice, and referred to a select committee of nine.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. GRENNELL said it had been usual heretofore, after ordering the appointment of the standing committees, to adjourn over till Monday in order to afford the Speaker time to discharge that duty; and, as he understood some alterations were about to be made in the Hall, it was perhaps the more necessary now. He therefore moved that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to this House copies of any report or communication received from Andrew Stevenson, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the Court of London, relating to a controversy in the public newspapers between him and Daniel O'Connell, a member of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in which controversy were involved the personal integrity of the said Stevenson, and the honor and interest of this country, whose representative he is.

2. That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any call has been made by him, or by his direction, upon the said Andrew Stevenson, to explain or account for his notorious violation of the laws of nations, of the laws of the land to which he was accredited as an ambassador of peace, and of the privileges of the British House of Commons, in the person of one of its members; whether any instructions have been given to the said Andrew Stevenson, consequent upon his conduct in these transactions, or any disavowal or censure of his conduct communicated to the British Government.

3. That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any call has been made by him, or by his direction, upon Matthew C. Perry, a captain in the Navy of the United States, to account for his violation of the laws of nations, of the laws of the foreign nations under the protection of which he was enjoying the benefits of a generous hospitality, of the laws of his own country, and of the rules and regulations for the Government of the United States, by his participation, with other citizens of the United States, in a conspiracy against the life of Daniel O'Connell, a member of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The resolution, calling for executive information, under the rule, would lie over one day.

Mr. ADAMS asked that it be now considered; but it was objected to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, inclosing a statement of the quantity of land covered by grants to Shane and others, in the Louisiana land district; which was laid on the table.

The Speaker then announced that there was no other business on the table; whereupon, On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 10, 1838.

Mr. BENTON and Mr. LINN of Missouri, Mr. WALKER of Mississippi, Mr. NICHOLAS of Louisiana, Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, and Mr. PRESTON of South Carolina, severally appeared and took their seats.

The PRESIDENT announced the appointment of the members to compose the additional standing committee, in pursuance of the resolution adopted at the last session, entitled the Committee on the Public Buildings.

Mr. FULTON, Chairman, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. RIVES.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the War Department, made in compliance with the provisions of the second section of the act of May 9, 1836, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for that year containing a statement showing the expenditures under the contingent head for that department for the fiscal year ending 3d instant.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Navy Department, made in compliance with the provisions of the act of 9th May, 1836, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for that year, containing a statement of the contingent expenses of the naval establishment for the year ending 3d instant; which,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, was ordered to be printed.

Also, a similar report from the Post Office Department; which,

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, was ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Senate, containing a statement of the contingent expenses of the Senate for the past year.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MARTIN VAN BUREN, jr., his Private Secretary, inclosing a special report from the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject of the defalcation of the late collector of customs at New York.

The message having been read,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of John J. Bulow; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of John Kurtz, praying remuneration for the loss of the ship Alleghany and cargo; which was referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the petition and papers of Gad Humphrey, on the files of the last session, were again referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. H. presented the petition of the heirs of Preserved Clapp, praying remuneration for the revolutionary services of the deceased.

Mr. LINN presented the credentials of the Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON, elected by the Legislature of Missouri a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of Charles F. Skinner, in behalf of himself and others, officers of the Army, praying that officers of the line may be put on the same footing as officers of the staff as to pay and emoluments; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the petition of Laurent Millaudon, of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, the petition of the heirs of John and Henry Banks; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the petition and Documents of William Barclay, of Alabama; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut presented the petition of the heirs of Moses Elmore;

Also, the petition of the heirs of Samuel Y. McKee;

Also, the petition of John Ramsey;

Also, the petition of Frederick Zeigle;

Also, the petition of the heirs of John Jordan;

Also, the petition of James McCrary, severally praying for commutation pay; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of Esther Sawyer, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of the heirs and devisees of Dr. John Rumney, late of the revolutionary army; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of E. Jones; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RIVES presented the petition of the heirs of Dr. William Ramsay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of Simeon Knight; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS presented the petition of Jacob Sly; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PIERCE presented the memorial of Joseph Bassett; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FULTON presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, recommending a cession of the public lands to the States in which they lie; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a resolution of the same, praying for an extension of the act to allow soldiers of the late war to enter their bounty lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, resolutions of the same, asking for an appropriation for the improvement of the Black, White, and other rivers; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WALL, it was Ordered, That the petition of ——— Morris, on the files of the last session, be again referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Thomas Fry, on the files of the last session, be again referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. LINN gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill to transfer to the citizens of the parish of Concordia, in the State of Louisiana, the interest of the United States to a certain tract of land.

A bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana.

A bill to confirm certain land claims in the Ouachita land district, in the State of Louisiana.

A bill to confirm claims to lands in the district between the Rio Hondo and Sabine rivers.

WISCONSIN CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, on leave, presented a statement of his claims for the seat as Delegate from Wisconsin.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House—

1. A report of the Solicitor of the Treasury on the petition of John Norris.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2. A communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting an abstract of the contingent expenditures in the office of the Fourth Auditor from October, 1837, to September, 1838.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, laid on the table.

3. From the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the contingent expenses of that Department during the last year.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, laid on the table.

4. From the First Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the unsettled accounts, or those on which balances appear to be due; which was laid on the table.

5. From the Postmaster General, inclosing a statement of the expenditures out of the contingent fund of that Department.

On motion of Mr. CONNER, laid on the table.

6. From the Secretary of State, inclosing, in answer to a resolution calling for similar information from all the Departments, a statement of the number of clerks employed, and how long so employed, in complying with calls for information.

Mr. HOWARD moved to lay this on the table for the present, giving notice that, when the residue came in, he should move their printing and disposition together.

7. From the Secretary of State, transmitting an abstract of the returns made to that Department by the collectors of customs for the relief and protection of American seamen.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, laid on the table.

8. From the Secretary of the Treasury, a statement of the contingent expenditures of that Department for the last year.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, laid on the table.

9. From the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, containing a statement of the expenditures on the public buildings, and other objects committed to that officer, during the last year.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

The following messages from the President of the United States were also laid before the House:

WASHINGTON, December 6, 1838.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The act of the 1st of July, 1836, to enable the Executive to assert and prosecute with effect the claim of the United States to the legacy bequeathed to them by James Smith son, late of London, having received its entire execution, and the amount recovered and paid into the Treasury having, agreeably to an act of the last session, been invested in State stocks, I deem it proper to invite the attention of Congress to the obligation now devolving upon the United States to fulfill the object of the bequest. In order to obtain such information as might seem to facilitate its attainment, the Secretary of State was directed, in July last, to apply to persons versed in science, and familiar with the subject of public education, for their views as to the mode of disposing of the fund best calculated to meet the intentions of the testator, and prove most beneficial to mankind. Copies of the circular letter, written in compliance with these directions, and of the answers to it received at the Department of State, are herewith communicated for the consideration of Congress.

M. VAN BUREN.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, referred to a select committee of nine.

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives reports from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying documents, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 9th of July last.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1838.

[The reports above alluded to contain all the papers and documents on file in the State and Treasury Departments relating to the Smithsonian bequest.]

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, referred to the same select committee as the foregoing.

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit a special report, made to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, for your consideration, in relation to the recently discovered default of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs at the port of New York.

I would respectfully invite the early attention of Congress to the adoption of the legal provisions therein suggested, or such other measures as may appear more expedient for increasing the public security against similar defaultations hereafter.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1838.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that so much of this document as related to the defalcation of the late collector of New York be referred to a select committee; and so much as related to the revenue laws to that on Ways and Means.

Mr. C. remarked that, in making the first motion, which he regarded as one demanding the exclusive consideration of a committee, it was proper for him to state that he did it with no design of acting upon the committee himself in any capacity. On the contrary, charged as he was with the laborious duties on another committee, he could scarcely devote the requisite time; and, independent of that consideration, it would be much more satisfactory to him that the members should come from a different quarter of the Union than Mr. C. did.

Mr. MERCER applauded the spirit and candor of the gentleman from New York; but he would suggest to the gentleman, as this was an important matter, to postpone it till to-morrow, and order it to be printed.

Mr. C. assenting, the subject took that temporary direction.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, except so much as related to the defalcation of the late collector of New York, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Wisconsin election case, being the next business in order, was, on motion of Mr. MERCER, referred to the Committee on Elections.

VIVA VOCE VOTING.

The next business was the following amendment to the rules, submitted some days since by Mr. DROMGOOLE:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House: Insert between the 10th and 11th rules, "in all cases of election by the House the vote shall be taken viva voce."

Mr. WISE had but a word to say upon this resolution, and it was this: he considered it a direct attack upon the independence of the House, a direct attack upon the freedom of elections there. Had they come to this, that members of that House were not to be trusted with the secret mode of election by ballot? Were the screws to be applied to those who stood in a doubtful position, and who might thereby be called upon to vote in order to support a particular party against their own predilections and principles? Although Mr. W. believed the viva voce mode of voting to be the best among the people and the freest from fraud, as late events had proven, yet he could not tolerate it here, as an engine of oppression and tyranny.

Mr. DROMGOOLE had no design in introducing the proposition of operating tyrannically upon the members of the House. He had offered it because it was founded on correct principles, and principles which had received and bore the sanction of his own State, and which he understood had also obtained sanction in several other States. His only object was the establishment of a general principle he believed to be correct in the abstract, and necessary and essential in carrying out the great Democratic doctrine of accountability. He would ask if it was not the fair and proper mode that the conduct of the Representative should be fully spread before his constituents; and he did hope that no Representative would oppose it because he wished to vote in secret and skulk from accountability, or because he desired to conceal his conduct from his constituents; nor was it with a view to any present purpose that he had introduced it, and he should have offered it before the election of Clerk, but for the delay that would have occurred in the organization of the House. He drew the attention of his colleague to the fact that the viva voce system prevailed in Virginia in all their elections, from that of a constable upwards.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to strike out the words "viva voce," and insert "by ballot." He said he objected to the original resolution, first, because the viva voce mode was an inconvenient one, and took up considerably more time than that by ballot; second, because it was an innovation upon the uniform practice of the House for fifty years; and, third, it was not so independent a mode as that of the ballot.

Mr. PICKENS opposed the resolution, though he held to responsibility to the fullest extent, so far as legislative duties were concerned. But there was a wide distinction between the responsibility they owed to their constituents for the exercise of the law-making power and that of choosing their mere ministerial officers; and he was yet to learn that he was responsible to his constituent for choosing this or that doorkeeper, this or that clerk. In such cases, Mr. P. held that he himself constituted a part of the constituent body. They were, in part, his officers, accountable to him for their conduct, and not to the people. The converse doctrine pushed, might be carried next into their boarding-houses.

But Mr. P. was inclined to doubt the policy of that resolution upon other and higher grounds. The experience of the last few months had taught him to dread a power higher than their Executive, and more tremendous in its operation—he alluded to the power represented by corporations. Pass that resolution, and this power will be brought directly to bear upon that House; and when it is, governmental and executive influence would be nothing compared with it.

Mr. P. admitted the general theory of the independence of open voting, especially in Virginia and Tennessee, where the mass of the voters are landholders; but go into other States where two thirds of them were differently situated, and especially into the larger cities, and, he would ask, where would be the independence of the elective franchise, if it were expressed viva voce with this tremendous power brought to bear upon it? He was opposed to the resolution, and should vote against it.

The resolution was further opposed by Messrs. PEARCE of Maryland, WISE, REED, SERGEANT, and STANLEY, and supported by Messrs. ROBERTSON, JENIFER, and S. W. MORRIS.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, with a view to effect both objects, moved an amendment that the vote should be taken by ballot, but each member should inscribe his name thereon.

Mr. STANLEY moved to lay the whole subject on the table; on which motion

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 81, nays 125; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Dennis, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Harlan, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Pearce, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Stanley, Stone, Toland, John White, Whittey, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Clark, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Deberry, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Elmore, Ewing, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, William H. Hunter, Jabez Jackson, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Maury, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McClure, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Matthias Morris, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrik, Phelps, Plumer, Pratt, Rariden, Reily, Rencher, Rives, Robertson, Rumsey, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shepler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stratton, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Thomas, Tillinghast, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vandever, Wagener, Webster, Albert S. White, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Yell—125.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. MONTGOMERY then rose, and said that in view of the shortness of the session, and the mass of business before them, and believing no further light could be thrown upon the subject, for it had undergone discussion, from year to year, for years back, he demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

The main question, being on the adoption of the original resolution, being then ordered thereon,

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 126, nays 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, Chaney, Chaney, Clark, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Deberry, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Elmore, Ewing, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McNeefe, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Matthias Morris, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrik, Phelps, Plumer, Pratt, Rariden, Reily, Rencher, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shepler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Thomas, Tillinghast, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vandever, Wagener, Webster, Albert S. White, Whittey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Yell—126.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Aycrig, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Dennis, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Harlan, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Pearce, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Thompson, Toland, John White, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—85.

So the proposition as originally introduced was agreed to.

Pending the taking of the question,

Mr. ADAMS called the attention of the House to the fact that the resolution would be unconstitutional, on the ground that in elections by the House, the Constitution of the United States provided that they should be by ballot. At a subsequent stage, however,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the rule adopted on this day be modified as follows: after the word "House," in the 4th line, insert "of its officers."

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, the use of the Hall was granted to the American Colonization Society for to-morrow evening.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, it was

Resolved, That the drawing accompanying the report from the Engineer Department on the light house on Timm's Knoll, in the harbor of New York, be printed.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, it was Ordered, That the drawings illustrative of the condition of certain improvements in navigation on Lake Erie, which accompany the annual report from the Topographical Bureau, and forming a part of the documents with the President's message, be printed.

On motion of Mr. WORD, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law to confer circuit court jurisdiction on the District Court of the United States for the northern district of the State of Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, it was

Resolved, That the use of this Hall be given to Professor J. Orville Taylor, of the University of New York, as requested by the American Common School Society, to deliver an address on Thursday evening, at — o'clock, on the condition of the common schools in this country, and in furtherance of the cause of general education throughout the United States.

Mr. MORGAN asked leave to present a resolution.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, objected.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN the rules were suspended; whereupon he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will, on to-morrow, at one o'clock, proceed to the election of a Chaplain to serve during the present session of Congress.

Mr. BRONSON moved to strike out "to-morrow, at one o'clock," and insert "this time;" which was disagreed to.

The resolution was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. SHIELDS, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 11, 1838.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Commissioner of Public Buildings, made in pursuance of the act of March 3, 1829, showing the sums expended on the different public buildings for the past year.

He also communicated the memorial of Samuel H. Thompson; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. TIPTON presented the memorial of the heirs of Henry Conway, late captain in the revolutionary army; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, praying that an appropriation may be made for the erection of a light-house at Indian Key, Florida; and also asking for the establishment of a port of entry and delivery at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a hospital at some point near the foot of the Muscle Shoals, for the accommodation of the sick and disabled boatmen and passengers navigating the Tennessee river.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing an increase of pension to John I. Billings.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing ports of entry and delivery at the cities of Chicago and Alton, in the State of Illinois.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of Abel Gay and Walter Loomis, as original contractors for constructing the Cumberland road.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Young, that the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a hospital for the accommodation of sick and disabled boatmen and passengers navigating the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, at the mouth of the Ohio river, in the State of Illinois, was, on motion of Mr. TIPTON, taken up, and, after being amended, was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the joint resolution returning the thanks of Congress to George Washington Lafayette, was taken up, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Senate went into executive session, and afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 11, 1838.

As soon as the Journal was read, Mr. HAYNES rose and said that, as the committees were appointed, he asked leave to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the President's message.

Mr. MERCER objecting, Mr. HAYNES moved a suspension of the rules, but it did not prevail.

Petitions and memorials were then called for in the order of States, and were presented as follows:

Messrs. EVANS and NOYES, of Maine.

RIGHTS OF THE SOUTH.

When New Hampshire was called on, Mr. ATHERTON rose and asked leave to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this Government is a Government of limited powers, and that, by the Constitution of the United States, Congress has no jurisdiction whatever over the institution of slavery in the several States of the Confederacy.

Resolved, That petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, and against the removal of slaves from one State to another, are a part of a plan of operations set on foot to affect the institution of slavery in the several States, and thus indirectly to destroy that institution within their limits.

Resolved, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly; and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories, as a means, and with the view, of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the several States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the public faith upon which they entered into the Confederacy.

Resolved, That the Constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy, and that Congress, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers, has no right to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the States and another with a view of abolishing the one and promoting the other.

Resolved, therefore, That all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or to prohibit the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the Constitution, destructive of the fundamental principle on which the Union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress; and that every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery as aforesaid, or the abolition thereof, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table, without being debated, printed, or referred.

Mr. CUSHING objected to their introduction at this time.

Mr. ATHERTON thereupon moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. ADAMS and Mr. CUSHMAN simultaneously demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 137, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Birme, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsal, Brodhead, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Chapman, Cheatham, Clowney, Colles, Connor, Crabh, Craig, Cary, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, De Gruff, Dromgoole, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gall, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hauer, Harlan, Harrison, Haynes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jacob Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kendle, Klingensmith, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, Martin, May, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Moore, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Paynter, Pease, Penningbacker, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Plunier, Pope, Pratt, Reily, Rencher, Rhet, Rives, Robertson, Rumsey, Augustine H. Shepherd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shupler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Sweetening, Tallierro, Taylor, Thomas, Titts, Touney, Towus, Turner, Underwood, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, John White, Whitlesey, Sherman Williams, J. W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yell—137.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayerig, Bouldin, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Casey, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davee, Davies, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Hays, Hastings, Derod, Ingham, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson, Mason, Mitchell, Ingam, Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Penningbacker, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Salmonstall, Sergeant, Shibley, Slade, Smith, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, and York—66.

So the rules were suspended.

The resolutions being before the House,

Mr. ATHERTON addressed the Chair, as follows: In addressing the House, at this time, my object is very briefly to explain the purport of the resolutions just offered, and the reasons which have induced me to present them.

The first resolution declares:

"That this Government is a Government of limited powers, and that, by the Constitution of the United States, Congress has no jurisdiction whatever over the institution of slavery in the several States of the Confederacy."

To suppose that this resolution would not meet very general assent, would be to suppose that the most ultra Federal notions are entertained as to the powers of the General Government, and that those powers are considered as entirely absolute and unlimited.

The second resolution declares:

"That petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, and against the removal of slaves from one State to another, are a part of a plan of operations set on foot to affect the institution of slavery in the several States, and thus indirectly to destroy that institution within their limits."

Legally and morally, Mr. Speaker, men are held responsible for the consequences which their acts have a manifest tendency to produce. This resolution contains an expression of our opinion as to the ultimate object and tendency of these petitions and memorials. Can any one who does not shut his eyes to what is going on around him doubt as to the effect and as to the intention of these petitions? I cannot doubt it, sir, without disbelieving the open avowals of these petitioners themselves. In saying this, I refer, however, not to many honest persons who have signed them without a sufficient examination of the important bearing of the question; nor to others, such, for instance, as females and children, who have had, in affixing their signatures, too frequently no definite intention or object, but to those who call loudly for the presentation of these petitions, who get them up, who circulate them for signature, and whose business it seems to be to agitate the community on this subject.

The third resolution declares:

"That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly, and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories, as a means, or with the view, of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the several States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the public faith, upon which they entered into this Confederacy."

The fourth resolution declares:

"That the Constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy, and that Congress, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers, has no right to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the States and another, with a view of abolishing the one and promoting the other."

I am not aware that any code of political construction or political morality ought to find favor in this House, by which the justice of these two resolutions shall not be fully admitted. Indeed, sir, I must say that all the resolutions to which I have adverted seem very like truisms, about which no dispute can be entertained; and it also seems to me that from these the principles contained in the fifth and last resolution follow by necessary consequence.

The fifth resolution declares:

"That, therefore, all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories, or to prohibit the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the Constitution, destructive of the fundamental principles on which the Union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress."

These are the principles laid down in the fifth resolution, and, as I have said, they seem to me to follow by necessary consequence from the preceding resolutions. But the fifth resolution proceeds still further, and provides for the mode of action of the House upon petitions, memorials, &c., on this subject; and from the principles embodied in the first part of the resolution, the propriety of the mode of action prescribed, becomes at once apparent.

The latter part of the resolution provides that every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, tending or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery as aforesaid, or the abolition thereof, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table, without being debated, printed, or referred.

This provision is, in effect, similar to the resolution of the 24th of December, 1837, on the same subject. It is within the knowledge of all, that the resolution of the 24th of December was also nearly similar to a resolution adopted by the House several years since, after full examination of the subject by a committee. The Representatives of the State which I, in part, represent, voted for that resolution, and one of them was of the committee who reported it. Their course met the decided approbation of a majority of their constituents, as I believe has the course of those who supported the similar resolution of the 24th of December. At any rate, I may be pardoned for saying of that constituency, that they are too intelligent to be misled by the idle and utterly unfounded pretense that the adoption of such a resolution is a denial of any right of petition. Still, sir, as in some portions of the country, from not sufficiently attending to the reasons inducing it, this may have been considered a measure bordering on harshness, I have thought proper, in submitting that part of the last resolution prescribing the mode of action by the House, which is similar in effect to the resolution reported by Mr. PIERCE, and to the resolution of the 24th of December, 1837, to preface it with the matter preceding, embodying the reasons which not only render the propriety of this course evident, but show the impropriety of any other. I would treat these petitions precisely as I would any other involving similar considerations. These subjects have excited anxious attention and reflection here and elsewhere. It would be doing injustice to the intelligence of the members of this House to suppose that any one of them had not made up his mind on the question whether we have a right to grant the prayer of these petitions or not. The Abolitionists themselves evince their own conviction that the minds of members, even before they enter this Hall, are made up on these subjects, by requiring them explicitly to state their opinions and the votes they intend to give. The matter has been once referred to a committee, who fully examined it, and reported such arguments as conclusively show our want of jurisdiction. Is it pretended that every petition must be referred, and a report be made in full upon it, and that the whole time of Congress should be spent upon the subject? The House, and each member of the House, has fully considered the subjects involved in these petitions. If, then, the House is decidedly of opinion that it has no right to act on these subjects as the petitioners desire, it is, as I conceive, our duty to dispose of the petitions with as little delay as possible, unless, indeed, our object be to waste our own time and the money of the people in discussion interminable and unavailing, or worse than unavailing, because intended to manufacture public sentiment for our constituents, rather than to acquire light for our own guidance, and thus indicating the assumption that we are the masters instead of the servants of the people. By the mode of action here prescribed, the petitions are to be presented like any other petitions; from the statement of their contents, required by the rules of the House, it is perceived that they relate to subjects which have been fully considered by the House, and on which a majority of the House have definitely formed an opinion that the House has no legitimate jurisdiction; and they are at once laid upon the table.

Believing, sir, as I do, that "the relation of master and slave is a matter exclusively within the regulation of the States where it exists, and that any interference by the inhabitants of other States in regard to it is not only unauthorized and intrusive, but faithless and dishonorable, as being against the letter and spirit of the sacred compact which binds us together"—believing that the agitation now practiced on the subject of the abolition of slavery, whether carried on under the pretext of maintaining the right of petition or any other pretext, results, either from a total misconception of the nature and rights of the General and State Governments, or, as there is reason to fear in some instances, from hostility to our established Republican institutions; that it tends to alienate the friendly regards of different parts of our country, and introduce sectional differences and divisions, to waste and consume the time of Congress, and enormously to increase the expenditure of the money of the people; that it is dangerous, not only to the rights of the citizens of the slaveholding States, but also, in the highest degree, to the integrity of the Union; that, if persisted in, it threatens to involve the whole country in the most alarming evils; and that it ought to be discountenanced by every friend of the Union and of Republican Government—I cannot but trust these resolutions will meet with the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. A. then demanded the previous question.

Mr. WISE. I ask the gentlemen of the North, as the North has been heard, that the South shall be heard also. These are not southern resolutions, and I repudiate them as such. I wish to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order.

Mr. CUSHING called for a division of the question, so as to take it on each resolution.

Mr. WISE. I ask leave of this House that the South may be heard upon this question.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that he must be aware debate could not be entertained after the previous question had been demanded.

Mr. WISE. Then I ask that my resolution may be read.

The SPEAKER said it could only be done by unanimous consent.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" from various parts of the Hall.]

Mr. WISE. It is a plot sprung upon the South.

Mr. TILLINGHAST would ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if, after following up a speech and an argument by the previous question, he would not withdraw it for at least the same length of time for a reply that his argument had consumed?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. STANLEY said, to use the words of a gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] on another occasion, he wanted to see every man both North and South, toe the mark; and, therefore, he moved a call of the House; which was ordered.

When the name of Mr. Wise was called, that gentleman rose in his place and said, as a Representative of southern people and southern interests, I am not here on the subject of abolition.

The call was proceeded in; and two hundred and twenty-three members having responded, Mr. TITUS moved to dispense with its further proceedings.

Mr. STANLEY called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 113, nays 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Everett, Farrington, Fairfield, I. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Herod, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, Rhett, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustus H. Sheppard, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vandever, Wagener, Webster, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, and Yell—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Herod, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lewis, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maury, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robertson, Rumsey, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Sergeant, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Talfierro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—99.

So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with; and the question recurring on the second for the previous question,

Mr. WISE again asked that a resolution he had drawn up as an amendment be read.

Mr. CUSHMAN objected.

Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rules; but the Chair ruled the motion to be out of order.

The previous question was seconded by the House—103 to 102—and ordering the main question.

Mr. GRENNELL demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BELL then rose, and said he would make a motion which he hoped would be assented to on all sides. It was to move that the House adjourn, and to order the resolutions to be printed and laid on their tables to-morrow, when they would vote understandingly upon them.

The SPEAKER said the motion to print would require unanimous consent.

Mr. BELL hoped no gentleman would object to a proposition that seemed to him so reasonable.

Objections were made, however, in several quarters, and Mr. BELL then made the motion to adjourn; on which

Mr. CUSHMAN demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 102, nays 113; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darling, Dawson, Davies, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Herod, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Southgate, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Talfierro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Deberry, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, James Graham, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Petrikin, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, Rhett, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustus H. Sheppard, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vandever, Wagener, Webster, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, and Yell—113.

So the House refusing to adjourn, the question recurred on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, then raised the question of order whether, as the 116th rule of the House provided that no standing rule should be changed without one day's notice, and as the 48th rule prescribed the mode of receiving petitions, and the fifth pending resolution proposed a change of that rule so far as a certain class of petitions was concerned, one day's notice should not have been given.

The SPEAKER said clearly not, and it had been so decided on a former occasion.

The vote was then taken; and the main question ordered—yeas 114, nays 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Deberry, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Mercer, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, Reilly, Rhett, Rives, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, and Yell—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darling, Davies, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Herod, Ingham, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Sheppard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Southgate, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Talfierro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Vandever, Albert S. White, John White, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—107.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS said he wished to be excused from voting on these resolutions, unless he could have an opportunity of explaining his views upon them. They came in a questionable shape; and he could not vote for them without further examination. He therefore asked the House to be excused; but, before the question was propounded,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said he had voted against adjourning before, because he could not persuade himself that the previous question would have been sustained; but seeing it had, he now renewed the motion.

Mr. PARKER called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 108, nays 113; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darling, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Herod, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Williams, and Yell—113.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The House also refused to excuse Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS from voting.

Mr. WISE gave his reasons, in part, for refusing to vote for or against the resolutions; but he was called to order for traveling out of the limits prescribed by the 30th rule. He stated that he should not vote.

Mr. STANLEY stated that he should not vote.

Mr. JENIFER stated that he should not vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved the House to excuse him, for he could neither vote affirmatively nor negatively, without placing himself in a false position.

The House refused to excuse Mr. UNDERWOOD.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, and it was adopted—yeas 198, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, John Campbell, William B. Sheppard, Shields, Shepler, Sibley, Smith, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Swearingen, Talfierro, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Christopher H. Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Sherrard Williams, Word, Yell, and Yorke—194.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Evans, Everett, Potts, Russell, and Slade—6.

On motion of Mr. COFFIN, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 12, 1838.

The PRESIDENT presented the following communication from JOHN QUINCY ADAMS:

To the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the request of Mr. George Washington Lafayette, and of the respected family of our late illustrious and ever-venerated friend, General Lafayette, I have the honor of presenting to Congress, in their name, a copy of the memoirs and writings of their honored parent, recently published by them, to be deposited in the Library of Congress.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES.

Mr. DAVIS moved the reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, referring the joint resolution on this subject to the Committee on the Library.

and that it be considered at this time; which motion was agreed to, and the motion to refer the resolution was reconsidered and rejected.

The PRESIDENT observed, in reply to a suggestion of Mr. D. that the resolution would now come up in its regular order.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT presented a memorial of a number of citizens of Alabama, praying that records of the surveys of the public lands may be preserved at the district land office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McKEAN presented the petition of John Midwinter, praying for a pension, in consideration of services rendered during the last war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRESTON presented the memorial of Mrs. Harriet Baker; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, presented the petition of James Logan, and others, asking for a modification of the pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of citizens of the counties of Yalobusha and Choctaw, in the State of Mississippi, for the establishment of a post route from Coffeeville, in Yalobusha county, through Graysport, to Bellefontaine, in the county of Choctaw; which petition was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the petition and papers of Amasa C. Brown, on the files of the last session, together with some additional evidence, were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of the executor of Thomas Griffin, of the revolutionary army, asking for the commutation of the deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the petition of Lieutenant John Goggan and Ensign Robert Walker, of the revolutionary army, asking for commutation pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of Commodore David Porter, asking, for reasons therein stated, and very forcibly stated, for the arrears of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of True-man Hastings and others, praying that post offices may not be compelled to remain open on Sundays; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FULTON presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, asking that the franking privilege may be extended to the Governors of States; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. TIPTON presented a memorial of the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad Company, for the right of way through the public lands, and a donation of land to aid said company; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial signed by numerous surgeons in the Navy, praying an alteration in their pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the petition and papers of John H. Macintosh, on the files of the last session were again referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Josephine Nourse, widow of Dr. Benjamin Nourse, a surgeon in the Army, asking for the half pay of the deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of William East, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred a bill making appropriations for the completion of certain roads begun by the United States in the State of Michigan, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," reported the same without amendment.

Also, from the same committee, the bill to prevent the counterfeiting of foreign copper, gold, and silver coins, and to prohibit the bringing the same into the United States, without amendment.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred the resolution of the Senate on the subject, reported a bill making an appropriation for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the same committee, also reported the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to the Senate the sum of money paid out of the Treasury under private appropriations made, or private bills passed by Congress since the first Monday in December, 1833, distinguishing the amount thereof made at each session of Congress during the said period, and the persons to whom and for what purpose paid; and also what sums, if any, remain unpaid:

Which was adopted.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ROBBINS offered a resolution that the Senate appoint a committee, to act with the House committee, to superintend the expenditure of moneys appropriated for the library of Congress; which was adopted.

In accordance with the resolution, the PRESIDENT appointed Messrs. ROBBINS, ALLEN, and WALL as said committee on the part of the Senate.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. McKEAN offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an allowance for house rent to the officers of the navy-yard at Philadelphia.

Mr. FULTON offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to enable the Secretary of War to continue the service of a suitable boat and crew to be employed in preventing the formation of a raft in Red river, in that part of said river from which the old raft has been removed.

Mr. WALKER offered the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, at as early a period as practicable, the number of superficial acres within each of the States of Alabama and Mississippi embraced in the treaty at Dancing Rabbit creek with the Choctaw Indians, designating in said report what quantity of said land in each of said States has been surveyed, what quantity still remains unsurveyed, what portion has been offered at public sale, how much has been sold, and what quantity is now subject to entry at private sale in each of said States.

Mr. TIPTON offered the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate a plat of the townships of public land through which the line of a road from New Albany, Corydon, Fredonia, and Princeton, Indiana, to Mount Carmel, Illinois, will pass, distinguishing between the tracts of land remaining unsold and those which have been sold, and situated within six miles of said road.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate whether certain exiles from Poland, to whom a grant of thirty-six sections of land was made by the act of Congress of June 30, 1834, upon certain conditions expressed in said act, have complied with the conditions; and if not, whether the said grant will be considered as forfeited by the Department, and the lands selected by their agent on the waters of Rock river, in the State of Illinois, subject to sale and entry as other public lands, without further legislation on the subject.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RIVES, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill regulating the pay of masters in the Navy; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McKEAN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to continue in force an act entitled "An act to provide for the relief of persons disabled by known wounds during the war."

Mr. FULTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a joint resolution to authorize an examination and payment of the claims of the workmen on the public buildings; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

Mr. DAVIS, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the owners of the brig Despatch; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill to remunerate the captors of the privateer Lydia; which was also read twice, and referred to the same committee.

Mr. DAVIS, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to provide for the final settlement and payment of the claims of States upon the United States for interest upon advances made by them during the last war with Great Britain; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to settle the title to a certain tract of land in Arkansas.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, on leave, introduced the following bills:

A bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved to that State by the act providing for her admission into the Union to be applied to the making of roads leading to said State; which was read twice, and referred.

A bill for the benefit of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company; and

A bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company.

The last two, after being read twice, were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause the reserved lead mines in Illinois, and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa to be sold as other public lands; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. YOUNG also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. RUGGLES gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Daniel Bates.

Mr. ROANE gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, directing the manner in which certain laws of the District of Columbia shall be executed.

Mr. PRESTON gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to regulate the pay of brevet officers.

The joint resolution presenting the thanks of Congress to George W. Lafayette, the son, and the surviving family of General Lafayette, was taken up, considered, and adopted.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill to provide for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands was taken up as the order of the day.

Mr. WALKER observed that when the amendment offered by the Committee on Public Lands, striking out the reduction of fifty cents, should be adopted, the bill would be precisely the same as the one which was so fully discussed at the last session, and passed by so large a majority. As this was the short session, it was necessary that this measure, so important to the citizens of the new States, should be acted on speedily in this House, if there was any hope of a final decision on it by both Houses. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no objection to acting on the bill, now that it had been reached in the orders of the day.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that the gentleman from Mississippi had correctly stated the character of the bill and the proposed amendment. It was precisely in the form of the present bill that the one of last session was introduced, and a similar amendment was adopted before it passed. He had hoped, when he introduced this bill, that as the reduction of fifty cents an acre only applied to lands that had been offered for fifteen years at the minimum price of $1 25 an acre, and then for one year, at one dollar, and after that, for another year, at seventy-five cents; considering, he said, the length of time that these lands must have been in the market before this reduction would apply, he had hoped that the gentlemen who opposed it the last session would withdraw their objections at this, and that the bill would be passed without this amendment. As, however, some of the friends of the bill still entertained the same objections to this lowest reduction, he should not now occupy the time of the session in discussing its propriety, though the amendment operated with peculiar hardships in some sections of the new States, and particularly in his own. He agreed with his friend from Mississippi, that if there was any hope of getting a final decision on the bill by both Houses before the close of this session, it was important that the action of this body upon it should be a speedy one; and he indulged the hope that, inasmuch as the bill had been passed by a large majority at the last session, after an able and full discussion, that the amendment would be disposed of, and the bill passed now.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, remarked that he came to the Senate this morning with no expectation that this measure, fraught with such conceivable importance to the public interests, would occupy their attention to-day; and he therefore came without any sort of preparation for its discussion. He was not in the habit at any time, nor was it his purpose on this occasion, to throw any impediments in the way of a bill, so as to defeat a fair consideration of it by both Houses; but still he thought that a measure of this nature should not be acted on without some time being allowed for preparatory consideration. His impressions as to the impolicy of disturbing the existing land system, and still more as to the impolicy of changing the price of the public lands, were well known to the Senate and to the public: still he should have liked a further opportunity for consideration on this important measure, and for expressing his views with regard to it. He was aware that the subject had been fully discussed at the last session, and that the body, with but few changes, was the same now as then; and with respect to them a repetition of the discussion was not important; still he thought there could not be imposed on this great question too anxious a consideration; and he therefore hoped that it would not be pressed now.

Mr. C. then moved that the bill be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that he would not object to the postponement, but for the fact that the bill had been so recently and so fully discussed, and was so thoroughly understood by every member of the body. It had been not only fully discussed in both Houses of Congress at the last session, but had undergone a considerable discussion in the public papers throughout the country. The honorable Senator himself had been heard in opposition to it; and, though he wished for further discussion, he had not intimated that he had any new views to offer, or could throw further light on the subject. It did seem to him that, as the bill had been lost at the last session only from want of time for action on it in both Houses, its friends could not consistently consent to delay it now. He would not, he repeated, object to the postponement asked for, if he expected the gentleman to throw any new light on the subject; but as the measure was one of vital importance to the new States, and especially to the one he represented, he could not, under the circumstances he had adverted to, and he hoped the friends of the bill would not, consent to its postponement.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLAY's motion; and it was carried; so that the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of John Branhan, late receiver of public moneys at Huntsville, Alabama, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, after being explained and advocated by Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills were also read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill for the relief of William Jones; and

The bill to establish an additional land office in the State of Alabama.

After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 12, 1838.

The first business in order was the consideration of the resolutions introduced yesterday by Mr. ATHERTON.

As soon, however, as the Journal was read, Mr. WISE rose and remarked that he did not perceive entered on the record the fact that he had refused to vote yesterday; and, as he wanted his constituents to see that he had not entertained the subject of abolition of slavery in the States, he moved that the Journal be corrected accordingly.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. WISE inquired if this motion would not go on the Journal of to-day?

The SPEAKER replied that it would.

Mr. WISE's object was attained, then.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, inquired if it would be in order then to move a reconsideration of the vote for the previous question.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that it would not, as the vote was in progress of being taken.

The second resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, and against the removal of slaves from one State to another, are a part of a plan of operations set on foot to affect the institution of slavery in the several States, and thus indirectly to destroy that institution within their limits.

Mr. BIDDLE asked permission to decline voting on the second proposition, as wantonly stigmatizing a mass of men. While he could not vote for it, he knew the reckless audacity with which a vote against it might be used to create a false impression. Mr. B. referred to the stand he had taken in his own district on this subject, and the manner in which he had been sustained. His Van Buren opponent had refused to answer the interrogatories propounded. Mr. B. thought that a body of honorable men ought not to place him in this false light for the mere transient purposes of party, with a view to influence the elections at the South, now that those at the North had been got through with. Mr. B. was proceeding further, but

The SPEAKER interposed, on the ground that the gentleman was transgressing the rules.

The House refused to excuse Mr. BIDDLE.

The question was then taken on the second resolution, and it was adopted—yeas 136, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Gray, Griffin, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kennedy, Klingsmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, Martin, James M. Mason, McNeill, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Paynter, Pearce, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Plummer, Pope, Pratt, Prentiss, Randolph, Riley, Rencher, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Robertson, Rumsey, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, and Yell—136.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bond, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Darling, Davee, Davies, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, McKennan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, Joseph L. Williams, and Yorke—65.

Mr. WISE, when his name was called, said: I refuse to vote.

Mr. CUSHING raised the question of order, that the gentleman was bound to vote unless excused; and that, as the names must be called alphabetically, the Clerk could not proceed to the next name and pass over that of Mr. WISE.

The SPEAKER said the point had been decided before; the roll must be proceeded with, after being once commenced.

Mr. CUSHING gave notice that he should raise the question again.

Mr. BRONSON, who stated that he was momentarily absent from his seat when his name was called, asked leave to record his name in the affirmative; but leave was not granted.

As soon as the roll was gone through, and before the vote was announced,

Mr. CUSHING again raised the above question; but it was ruled to be out of order.

The third resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly; and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories, as a means, and with the view, of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the several States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the public faith upon which they entered into the Confederacy.

Mr. BOND called for a division of the question, so as to take the vote first on the following branch only:

Resolved, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly.

The vote being so taken, resulted in the affirmative—yeas 173, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clark, Clowney, Coffin, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Deberry, De Graff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Elmore, Ewing, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Halstead, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingsmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Sampson Mason, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKenney, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Noyes, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Plummer, Pope, Pratt, Prentiss, Randolph, Riley, Rencher, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Robertson, Rumsey, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, and Yell—173.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allan, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Childs, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Grennell, Hall, Kennedy, Lincoln, Calvary Morris, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Saltonstall, Slade, Smith, Tillinghast, and Yorke—30.

So the first branch of the third resolution was adopted.

The second branch being read,

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, inquired if the mover himself could modify this resolution?

The SPEAKER said he could not after the House had seconded the previous question upon it.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana. Could he not do it by the unanimous consent of the House?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, asked it, but it was objected to.

Mr. WISE called for such a division of the question as would, in the first instance, omit the sentence after the word "Columbia" to the word "States," in the sixth line.

The SPEAKER said the proposition was not susceptible of such a division, because that sentence could not stand by itself as a substantive proposition.

The question was then taken, and resulted also in the affirmative—yeas 164, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. So the third resolution was adopted, and the fourth was taken up, as follows:

Resolved, That the Constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy, and that Congress, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers, has no right to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the States and another, with a view of abolishing the one and promoting the other.

Mr. LINCOLN called for a division of the question on this resolution, so as to take it first on the following branch:

Resolved, That the Constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy.

Such a division being accordingly ordered, the vote thereon resulted affirmatively—yeas 180, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. The second branch of this resolution was also agreed to—yeas 174, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bond, Bouldin, Briggs, Broadhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, William B. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allan, Borden, William B. Calhoun, Cranston, Darlington, Davies, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Grennell, Hall, Halstead, Hastings, Peck, Potts, Rariden, Robinson, Saltonstall, Slade, Smith, and Tillinghast—24.

Mr. KENNEDY, when his name was called, said he wished to inquire before he voted whether a clerical error could be first corrected in this part of the resolution.

The SPEAKER said it could not.

Mr. KENNEDY rejoined that he should vote for it, but he did so protesting against its bad grammar.

The fifth and last resolution was in the following words:

Resolved, therefore, That all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or to prohibit the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the Constitution, destructive of the fundamental principle on which the Union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress; and that every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery as aforesaid, or the abolition thereof, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table, without being debated, printed, or referred.

Mr. RANDOLPH called for a division at the word "Congress" in the ninth and tenth lines; which was ordered.

Mr. WISE then said: I now, if it be in order, and in order to test the sense of the House upon all the resolutions, move a suspension of the rules, with a view of offering an amendment to this proposition, so as to strike out the words, "with the views aforesaid," and that gentlemen may not have an excuse of apprehending a debate on abolition, I pledge myself not to say a word upon it. I will vote for the resolution if they will strike out these words.

The SPEAKER could not entertain the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WISE. Well, then, I will remark that these are the words that sold the South.

The first branch of the proposition was adopted—yeas 146, nays 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bond, Bouldin, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Crabb, Craig, Cray, Crockett, Curtis, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, De Graff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Halstead, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, Iugham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, May, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Peck, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Pratt, Randolph, Reily, Rencher, Rhett, Rivers, Robertson, Rumsey, Sawyer, Augustine H. Sheppard, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Word, and Yell—146.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allan, Ayer, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Cranston, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Giddings, Goode, Grant, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Halstead, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, McKennan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Reed, Robinson, Saltonstall, Sheffer, Sibley, Slade, Stratton, and Tillinghast—52.

Mr. DAWSON, when his name was called, said: Mr. Speaker, I shall vote in the affirmative, omitting or expunging, so far as my vote goes, the words "with the views aforesaid." Congress has no constitutional power, for any "views," or for any purposes whatever, to interfere with the question.

Mr. POTTS moved to lay the second branch on the table.

Mr. CRAIG demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 85, nays 129; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Bond, Borden, Briggs, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Halstead, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Ingham, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Sheffer, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, Joseph L. Williams, Word, and Yorke—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Broadhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, De Graff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, May, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Mercer, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Matthias Morris, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, Reily, Rencher, Rhett, Rivers, Robertson, Rumsey, Sawyer, Augustine H. Sheppard, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, John White, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yell—129.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. JENIFER inquired if the affirmation of this last proposition would not be identical with a virtual reception of all petitions on the abolition of slavery by the House?

The SPEAKER replied that that was a question which each gentleman must interpret for himself.

Mr. POPE said he wished to be excused from voting upon this proposition, (he had voted for all the others,) on the ground that he did not wish to affirm the reception of abolition petitions, and further, that it was inconsistent with the propositions already adopted. Any vote he could give would be misconstrued.

The House refused to excuse Mr. P.

Mr. CHAMBERS also moved to be excused, on similar grounds to those of his colleague; but the House again refused.

The second branch of the last proposition was then agreed to—yeas 126, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Broadhead, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cray, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, De Graff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Elmore, Fairfield, Farrington, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, May, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Menefee, Mercer, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Pratt, Reily, Rencher, Rhett, Rivers, John Robertson, Rumsey, Sawyer, Augustine H. Sheppard, Charles Shepard, Shields, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Wagener, Webster, John White, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yell—126.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Halstead, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Ingham, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, McKennan, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Sheffer, Slade, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, Joseph L. Williams, Word, and Yorke—78.

Mr. WISE, when his name was called, said that, as that proposition admits the right of petition on this subject, he should refuse to vote upon it.

The resolutions being all severally adopted, Mr. KENNEDY asked leave to submit the following:

Resolved, That the Constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy; and that Congress, in the exercise of its alleged powers, has no right to discriminate between one portion of the States and another, with a view of abolishing the institutions of the one, or promoting those of the other.

Objections being made, Mr. K. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. POTTS moved that the House adjourn; which prevailed; and the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 13, 1838.

Mr. SOUTHARD, of New Jersey, and Mr. TALLMADGE, of New York, appeared in their places in the Senate.

Mr. WALKER presented the credentials of Hon. THOMAS H. WILLIAMS, appointed by the Governor of the State of Mississippi a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. JAMES TROTTER.

Mr. WILLIAMS appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT presented a memorial from sundry citizens of the State of Alabama, praying the confirmation of the sale of a reservation made to an Indian chief under the Creek treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented the memorial of a number of persons engaged in the manufacture of pins, praying for a repeal or modification of the duty on brass wire; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. C. also presented the memorial of a number of persons in the State of New York, deprecating the evils of war, and praying Congress to take such measures as may promote the formation of a Congress of nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. C. also presented the memorial of a number of persons engaged in steam navigation on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, praying for a modification of the act of last session for the regulation of steamboats; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the memorial ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of Mrs. Glentworth, widow of General Glentworth, praying for a pension in consideration of the services of her deceased husband; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAYARD presented two memorials of officers of the line of the Army, praying that their pay may be assimilated to that of officers of the staff; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company, praying Congress to refund certain duties on railroad iron; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Isaac Day, on the files of last session, be again referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Gerardo Carusi, on the files of last session, be again referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John H. Platt, on the files of last session, be again referred to the Committee on Claims.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill in relation to copyrights.

Mr. WRIGHT gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill more effectually to secure public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters.

Mr. LYON gave notice that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act confirming certain land claims in the State of Michigan.

Mr. MERRICK gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation for the erection of a free bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, in the city of Washington.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further appropriation for the construction of a marine hospital in the city of Mobile.

Mr. HUBBARD offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Abigail Newman, widow of the late Timothy Newman, master commandant of the ship-of-war Warren, who died in August, 1800, while in the naval service of the United States.

On motion of Mr. H., certain papers connected with the above petition were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which the same had been referred, reported the bill to confirm the sale of certain reservations of public lands, without amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, also reported the bill granting to the county of Kalamazoo, in the State of Michigan, the right of preemption to a quarter section of land, and for other purposes, without amendment.

Also, the bill for the relief of John Newton, without amendment.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the bill for the relief of Jean B. Valle, without amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, without amendment, the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to require the judges of the district court of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State," approved June 30, 1838.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which the memorial on the subject had been referred, reported, without amendment, a bill for the relief Laurent Millaudon and others; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which the subject had been referred, reported, without amendment, an act in addition to an act for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

FOURTH INSTALLMENT OF DEPOSIT.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, reported a bill further to postpone the fourth installment of the deposits with the States, under the act of June, 1836; which was read.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said that he should like really to see, if this installment was again to be postponed, so contrary to what they all expected at the last session, that it was not postponed indefinitely. He had hoped that there would at least, have been some prolongation of the promise to the States, that they might look forward to some time when they might reasonably hope to receive this money, which they all expected, and which many of them had made arrangements to appropriate to useful and important purposes. He should like to know if one year's further postponement would not be sufficient; and without saying whether he should vote for the bill in any event, he hoped that it would be so amended as to postpone the payment to some day certain, say the 1st of January, 1840, instead of being postponed, as provided for by the bill, until the further pleasure of Congress was expressed on the subject.

Mr. C. then moved to amend the bill by making the postponement till the 1st January, 1840.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that he was not then disposed to occupy the time of the Senate by discussing the subject of this bill. The committee had reported it with a view to the state of the Treasury, as indicated by the Secretary in his annual report. That exhibit showed that by the 1st of January there would be no money in the Treasury for the payment of this fourth installment, and there was no anticipation of that officer that there would be any moneys for the purpose by the 1st of January thereafter. The committee believed, as he did, that the time had arrived when the Treasury had parted with all the money that it could spare, and carry on the operations of the Government, without calling on the States for the repayment of the installments they had already received. He knew of nothing which promised that the Treasury would be able to spare this money by the 1st of January, 1840, and therefore must oppose the amendment. Having made this explanation, he would content himself with asking for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said that he confessed he was utterly unable to know what would be the condition of the Treasury by the time mentioned, and this, he believed, was more than was practicable for anybody to know; for, after the defalcations of two public officers which had lately come to light, to the astonishment of this country—one for $1,000,000, and the amount of the other as yet unknown—no one could possibly tell. One thing they did know, and that was, if they could get back this money, or any part of it, the state of the Treasury would be very different from what it would be with the total loss of it. He knew nothing as to the amount of these defalcations, or as to the means of the Government to recover back the whole or any part of them, and therefore would not hazard any calculations as to their probable value. The gentleman from New York could not say that the Treasury would be in a condition to pay this money by the 1st of January, 1840; that was very true. Such was the nature of our financial concerns that no man could say with certainty, a year beforehand, what our receipts and expenditures would amount to; but he would observe that, if it should be found when the time came round, the Treasury was not in a condition to meet this payment, there would be the same power in Congress that there now was to postpone it for another year. But what he wanted, to see was that the act of Congress providing for this deposit should be fulfilled, and the pledge redeemed, by carrying out the assurances given by that act. Some greater security would be given to the States that they would eventually receive this money, if a definite day was fixed for the postponement, than if it was left, as provided for in the bill, for the future action of Congress. If it was postponed till the 1st day of January, 1840, a still further postponement would require the consent of both branches of the Legislature, as well as of the Executive; whereas, if the bill passed in its present shape, it would amount to an indefinite postponement, without a special act of Congress, sanctioned by the Executive. He was glad the yeas and nays had been called, as he wished to record his vote in favor of continuing the hope that the deposit act would be eventually carried out.

Mr. WRIGHT replied that it was not his intention now to enter into a discussion of the lamentable defalcations which had lately come to light. He had not the information to enable him to speak to that body intelligibly on the subject. All he knew with regard to them was derived from glancing at the very voluminous report of the Secretary, which had been ordered to be printed, and which was not yet laid upon their tables. He was as much devoid of information on the subject as the Senator who last addressed them. But this much he would say, that if this matter was not thoroughly understood by Congress, and by the whole country, before the close of the session, it would not be his fault. It was his fixed purpose to have a thorough investigation of the whole subject, and to let his constituents know the whole truth. Then, as to the bill before them: it was not his purpose to hold out to the States expectations that he did not believe could be realized. In September last, the Committee on Finance proposed the same postponement of this installment, and on the same terms that they now did. For himself, he thought that the time had gone by when they were authorized to hold out any expectations to the States from a surplus in the Treasury, though, at the same time, he agreed that he had no power to look forward and say precisely what would be the condition of the Treasury at the end of another year. He had no information which enabled him to say that this installment could be met on the 1st of January, 1840, easier than it now could.

Mr. CALHOUN said he should vote for the postponement moved by the Senator from Kentucky, though he had not the slightest anticipation that there would be any surplus in the Treasury either in this or in the coming year. The question would then naturally occur why he gave such a vote? The answer was, in the first place, that it could do no harm, and in the next place, it would have the effect to check this House in its expenditures. If the expenditures had not been so profuse last year, there might then have been a payment of this installment. But this and the other House took different views from what he did, and their expenditures were more profuse than they ever had been since he was connected with the Government. He had hoped at the last session that the postponement of this installment would have had some effect to check their extravagant expenditures, but though he was disappointed, he would again vote for the postponement with the same views. He would, however, take this occasion to say, that he never would consent to vote a dollar for this installment, which he never regarded in the light of a debt, while they had to borrow money. The Senator from Kentucky was entirely mistaken in regarding the deposit act in the light of a promise to the States. There was no pledge, no obligation whatever; the act was one of expediency merely, and it had fulfilled its object. He repeated again that he would never consent to give his vote to borrow money to pay that installment.

Mr. NILES said he did not purpose to enter into an extended discussion of this subject, but would only offer a few remarks in reply to the suggestions of the gentleman on the other side of the House, [Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky,] in which assertions had been made, and principles advanced, which were of an importance not to be overlooked. It is now, sir, for the first time, proposed to raise a revenue for the purpose of a distribution among the States—to raise money from the people, in their individual capacity, to be distributed among the States in their corporate capacity, to inure to the benefit of chartered monopolies. He (Mr. N.) knew this was not intended, nor thought of, when the deposit bill was passed by the Senate. The object was to get rid of an enormous surplus which had accumulated, and was distributed among ninety banks, expanding our already overgrown paper system, corrupting the legislation of Congress, and embarrassing to public and private affairs. On this ground he voted for that bill, as did a majority of those who voted with him. But he contended that the object for which the bill had been passed was accomplished; the surplus had been deposited. He asked if it was pretended by the Senator from Kentucky that there is a surplus in the Treasury now, or would there be a surplus at the period proposed in the amendment. Did not the gentleman know that by the operation of his own law, (the compromise act,) the biennial reduction of the duties on imports would occur during the coming year, thus lessening, by that amount, the fiscal resources of the Government? Under these circumstances, to hold out the hope, as would be done by the proposed amendment, that the fourth installment would be paid in January, 1840, when there would be no surplus in the Treasury, would be to sanction the idea that the money would be raised by taxation. This is the essential question, and the only question before the Senate. But it is said that the Government should redeem its pledge; that the good faith of the Government is pledged for the payment of the fourth installment of deposit. Sir, if it is a debt due by the Government to the States, it should be discharged. But instead of having any just claim for this money, the States are under obligations to Congress for not reclaiming the three installments already deposited. If it was not for the interposition of Congress, good faith would have required the Secretary of the Treasury to recall the money deposited with the States, for the necessities of the Government; such was the spirit and requisitions of the act. He, and the friends who were with him, had supported the bill in good faith as a deposit act, not a distribution among the States. It was to be a deposit of a surplus. This had been accomplished, and the bill had fulfilled its functions. If it was intended as any more than a deposit act—for a distribution of money among the States—then was our legislation a fraud upon the country.

He would remark, in reply to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] who proposes to vote for the amendment, that it may be an inducement to retrenchment and economy in the expenditures of the Government, that it would be better to take a more direct method. Let us adhere to that first great principle, which he [Mr. C.] has so often and so ably advocated on this floor, to raise no more money from the people than is necessary for an economical administration of the Government. This, sir, would be preferable to checking a contemplated extravagant expenditure by countenancing what is, technically, a deposit—substantially, a distribution act.

Mr. BENTON remarked that the natural progress of this thing had been distinctly pointed out by him when he had the honor, in connection with half a dozen other gentlemen, to oppose the deposit act. He knew then that it was a distribution among the States. He knew that it was the commencement of a system of levying money from the people, for those who would get it out of the hands of the people. He treated this act then as a distribution, and scouted the idea of its being a deposit. He knew there was no surplus in the Treasury, and said so, and that, in a few years, we should be left without money. He stated these facts on this floor, in such strong language, that a member came to him, and begged him not to publish his remarks. He stated then that the effect of this act would be either to break the deposit banks, or to compel them to crush their debtors. Everything he then said had been verified to the letter. We have seen (said Mr. B.) a committee of the directors of the banks of New York, men of the highest intelligence, and well versed in financial affairs, placing at the head of the reasons which compelled them to suspend specie payments, the effect of this distribution act. He (Mr. B.) knew then as well as now, that one of the effects of this act would be either to compel these deposit banks to choose between stopping themselves, or crushing those indebted to them. He knew then that in the short space of two years we should be without money, and it was now seen that he was right; for instead of calling back from the States any of the money already distributed to them, as provided for in the many cautious words inserted in the act to make it appear like a deposit, the Government was driven to the expedient of raising money by a forced loan, for Treasury notes were nothing but a forced loan from those to whom they were paid. Instead of calling on the States for a return of a part of this money deposited with them, this body was now reproached with a breach of faith to the States for not going on to deposit the remainder, which was also claimed as a debt. That which in the first instance was declared to be a deposit only, and treated on that floor as a deposit, was now in the same place declared to be a debt, and the Federal Government was taunted with a breach of faith for not paying it.

Now what was the effect of the motion under consideration? It was a direct proposition, to be carried on hereafter, of raising money by indirection for the purpose of distribution. It was a case in which the powerful and strong would be arrayed against the weak. I was a direct proposition to commit this Government to the system of depositing money with the States. The effect would be, that all that party who are in favor of raising money of the whole to divide among the few, would throw every vote to diminish just and necessary appropriations, and to keep up the taxes. The price of the public lands would be kept up; and by the time the tariff act shall have worked out its object in January, 1840, there would be enough interested to band together for the purpose of raising from the Asiatic section of the Union, the cotton-growing States, a sufficient sum for distribution. Your cotton crop, (said Mr. B.,) amounting to some hundred millions, will hold out strong temptations to the friends of this system of distribution. Mr. B. said he had voted here for the last ten years against this system of collecting money for distribution. He opposed it when it was proposed by a Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON,] for the purpose of keeping up the tariff. He opposed it with the same zeal when a subsequent proposition was made to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and again when it returned in the insidious shape of a deposit act. In all this he found himself sustained by the young State of Missouri; for young as she was, and destitute of resources, she despised the whole policy of distribution. Both branches of her Legislature adopted a resolution condemning the whole thing, and instructing her Senators and Representatives to oppose it forever. In obedience, then, to her instructions, as well as in accordance with the dictates of his own judgment, he solemnly protested against the odious principle. It was two hundred years since the Lord Chancellor Burleigh put into the mouth of Queen Elizabeth the noble sentiment, that the best treasury of a Government was the pockets of the people. This sentiment was, even at that time, received with rapture by a British Parliament; but it was still older than the time of Chancellor Burleigh, for it was that prince of orators and statesmen in the republic of Athens, (Demosthenes,) when a vile scheme was proposed to raise money for a similar object, who indignantly trampled the whole under foot, and then uttered the memorable sentiment that has since been so often quoted. The author said, "No! Leave this money in the pockets of the people. When the country needs it for her defense, call for it, and the people will cheerfully give it." These (said Mr. B.) are my sentiments.

A proposition was made, the effect of which was to commit the Senate to this system of distribution; and it had been said on that floor that no harm could ensue from it. It was like the old woman's medicine of milk and water: if it did no good, it could do no harm. Such language did not belong to statesmen, nor to the elevated theater of an American Senate. The whole proposition was wrong to hold out to the American people a scheme for future distribution, which, it was evident, could not be carried into effect without resorting to taxation. What prospect was there, he would ask, of its being realized? Look at the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it would be found that so far from there being any surplus to divide, the reverse was the case; that there was a falling off of the revenue derived from the land sales, and a falling off of that derived from the tariff; and the prospect was that by the year 1840, there would be a still greater diminution. At this very time we were hardly able to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government, though we had been forced to the raising of money by extraordinary means, such as selling bonds, and issuing Treasury notes, which were nothing more than forced loans; yet we had been called on for this fourth installment, and charged with breach of faith for not making it. Are we (said Mr. B.) under such circumstances,—to say nothing of the principles of raising money for distribution,—are we to excite expectations in the States that this Government is to raise eight or nine millions by taxation to be divided among them? The effect of the vote taken on this proposition, if, unhappily, it should be carried, would be to make such States as were willing to accept this money to look upon it as a pledge that this nine millions was turned over to them; and, being so, it would become the bounden duty of this Government to provide the surplus by arresting necessary appropriations, by raising new taxes, by the issue of Treasury notes, and by a resort to the old tariff; and when this much was done, then all was done that was wanted. The example would be set, which would be followed up, of raising money from the weaker portions of the Union to divide among the stronger and more populous parts of it. Our revenues were derived principally from the weaker parts of the Union—from cotton, which, being carried to Europe, the proceeds are brought back in merchandise, which pays duties. The agriculture of the West also contributes its share in the same way. Then (said Mr. B.) adopt this proposition—only establish the principle—and the South and West must prepare themselves in future for a heavy course of taxation, until the falsity and enormity of the system shall eventually prostrate it. Mr. B. said he was opposed to a postponement to the next year, or to the year after that. He was for a postponement, not only indefinitely, but in the strongest and clearest language that could be used. He was for an eternal, perpetual, and everlasting postponement.

Mr. PRESTON concurred with the Senator from Missouri in the impropriety of holding out the idea that this installment would be paid in 1840. He did not think it proper that the Senate should take such a course as would hold out a fallacious hope, to deceive the States and the people of the United States. In accordance with these sentiments, he thought the proper course would be to repeal at once the first section of the deposit act; and if any Senator would make such a motion he would support it. He concurred in the sentiment that the raising of money for distribution was unconstitutional, and admitted that he was mistaken in the operations of the deposit act. There was a necessity for the passage of the law, from the frightful surplus we had accumulated. But, sir, our part of the law has been completed, the surplus has been distributed, and the Treasury is compelled to an unconstitutional issue of Treasury notes to sustain itself. We have appealed to the avarice of the States, and how have they responded? Instead of vigilance and economy, the States have gone on in schemes of unparalleled extravagance. Why appeal longer to the vigilance of the States to control us in our expenditures? He thought if he had known that, instead of reclaiming the money deposited with the States, when the Treasury was exhausted, the Secretary would have borrowed money by a forced loan, he would have opposed, with the Senator from Missouri, the passage of this law. He thought it had been mischievous in its operations, in some respects, and accelerated the fiscal calamities under which we have so lately suffered. But it was not the sole cause. There was an antagonist system for getting rid of the surplus by enormous appropriations for extravagant and useless objects; and though our system prevailed, we increased our expenditures even after our surplus was deposited with the States. We had bounded rapidly from a surplus of $60,000,000 and an appropriation of $40,000,000 to an insolvent Treasury. But the deposit act had failed in the great object proposed by its enactment, and, having failed, is it correct to continue it upon the statute-book? Is there any probability of any portion of the money being hereafter reclaimed from the States? Why, then, continue it? He had acted in good faith when voting for that bill; he had voted for it as a deposit act; a deposit which would be called for, and ought to be called for, when needed for the exigencies of the Government. He was deceived. He concurred with the Senator from Missouri that the act had a squinting towards raising a revenue for distribution, and on that ground was for obliterating it.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he should vote for the amendment, as he was about to rise to offer a similar one, when he was anticipated by his friend from Kentucky. His object having thus been accomplished, he designed to sit still and give a silent vote on the question; but some gentlemen had seen fit to go into the merits of the deposit act, which they pleased to term a distribution bill. He had said on a former occasion, that whenever gentlemen thought proper to discuss the merits of that bill, he would not sit still a silent listener. He took an active part in the passage of that act, believing that he was right then, and he believed so now. Gentlemen talked of a deception when that bill was passed. Sir, (said Mr. T.) there was no deception and no misconception. The matter was perfectly understood, and this body put the bill in a shape to obviate all difficulties. The bill as it was originally introduced was not a distribution act, but one for a mere deposit with the States. But gentlemen say that the effect of it was a distribution. Why, General Jackson himself recommended an absolute distribution three times over! Twice in his annual messages, and again in his veto message on the land bill; and when he heard that objections had been raised in Congress as to the unconstitutionality of the measure, he recommended that the Constitution should be so amended as to remove any doubts on the subject. At that time no objections were heard from his friends; no, sir, it was their party doctrine; but when the time arrived that we had a surplus revenue far beyond what had been anticipated, and the proposition was made, not for an absolute distribution, but for a deposit with the States, the whole matter was changed—the President changed his opinions, and his friends changed theirs. That bill, however, passed the Senate with only six dissenting voices. How was it, that it had been received with so much dissatisfaction in different parts of the country? It was because it had offended a party. The official organ here denounced it, and denounced every man who voted for it—though every member of that body but six voted for it, and it was the very measure previously recommended by the President. Now, how did that bill pass? When gentlemen talk about giving this money to the States, let us look and see how it is.

Sir, (said Mr. T.) we adopted an amendment by which this money was kept within the control of Congress. It was provided that it should be distributed among the States in the ratio of their representation, who should give their certificates for the amounts received by them; and that whenever it should be wanted for the purposes of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury should sell the certificates in the market, which should, from the time of sale, bear an interest of five per cent. That amendment placed the money entirely under the control of the Government; it was placed in the hands of the States, who could use it for valuable objects, without interest, until the Government wanted it. The State of New York, for instance, invested her quota in her school fund, which was laying a firmer foundation for national defense than if it had been expended in brick and mortar in a new system of fortifications, as the gentleman from Missouri wanted to expend it; and if this system of fortifications had been carried out, it must in the end have bankrupted the Treasury; for these fortifications would either have gone into dilapidation, or they must have appropriated millions annually to keep them up. Had the deposit act passed both Houses as it passed here, there never would have been a necessity to call on the States for this money, or to issue Treasury notes. The Secretary of the Treasury would have had the power to sell these certificates in the market, which would have been a good financial operation; and the money could have been obtained for the wants of the Government without putting the States to the slightest inconvenience. The bill, however, was amended in the other House, on the suggestion of the President; and by that amendment this invaluable feature was stricken out, and in lieu of it, it was provided that the Secretary might draw on the States for small installments, by giving a short previous notice.

Why, then, did not the Secretary draw for this money in accordance with the provisions of the act? Perhaps he thought the notice was too long, and the installments too small; and perhaps he did not care to incur the responsibility of this mode of proceeding. With this view of the case, was it right for gentlemen to complain of this act as a distribution? Why, there was no such principle advocated or adopted here. The principle contended for was a deposit with the States where the Government could command it when wanted. Had the measure been carried out as advocated and adopted in the Senate, we should have had no difficulties; and the States would not have been embarrassed by a call for money which they had laid out in useful objects. Gentlemen said that the Government was about to be committed to the system of distribution by the adoption of this motion. This was not so. The Government would be no more committed than it was on a former occasion, when the same postponement of the fourth installment was made in the terms now proposed. There would be no committal at all; and he was for having the postponement placed in the situation which this amendment contemplated, so that it should require the action of Congress to postpone it again; and, if there should be a surplus, it would not be in the power of one House, or of the veto of the Executive, to prevent its being paid over to the States. When gentlemen talked of committing the Government, they were committed already. They say (continued Mr. T.) that we are to have no more surpluses. That might be so; but in some of the elections lately held at his State, he heard it argued that in case we had another surplus we ought to have a sub-Treasury, in order that the banks might not get it to expand their issues on. He, for one, would not consent to put it out of the power of Congress to pay this fourth installment, if both Houses thought it right to do so; nor would he agree to put it in the power of the Executive veto to prevent the States from receiving this money.

Mr. CALHOUN felt very little interest as to what disposition was made of the motion. He was willing to postpone the fourth installment for a year, or to postpone it indefinitely as in the bill, or to repeal the deposit law altogether. That act had performed its functions, and there was now no reason for retaining it on the statute-book. He had no apprehension that there would be any surplus revenue to dispose of between this and the year 1842, and for many years thereafter, and if any gentleman would move a repeal of the bill, he would cheerfully vote for it. That act had performed a most important part. It was not surprising that those who opposed it on its passage should condemn it now; but he was, he confessed, greatly surprised to hear those who zealously advocated it, condemn it and treat it as deceptive. Sir, (said Mr. C.) there was no deception. If there was a deception, then I am the deceiver, and I trust that those who know me know that deception is the last fault that I could be charged with; that, whatever might be his faults, he always moved directly upon his object. He never considered this act in any other light than as a deposit; but he avowed, at the time, that he never thought that this money would be called for, except in case of a war with some European Power. Sir, (said Mr. C.) after having openly made this avowal, I little expected to hear it said that a deception was practiced. The deposit act was a noble act, necessary to meet the political disease that was preying on the vitals of the community, and doing more to corrupt the public morals than any evil that had befallen us since the beginning of the Government. It was a departure from that sacred principle, deeply so in our Government, of raising no more money by taxation than was necessary for the economical support of the Government, that had caused the evils this act was passed to correct. It was in 1824 and 1828 that that sacred principle was departed from, by which the Asiatic portion of the Union, as the South has just been called, was so deeply depressed, and extravagance and waste introduced into our system of expenditures. It was not the distribution act which had produced the late pecuniary embarrassments, both public and private. It was the acts of 1824 and 1828 which violated this principle, and by which, out of an import of $64,000,000 in one year, $32,000,000 passed into the Treasury, raised out of the southern staple, which was a tax beyond what the most despotic Government on earth had ever levied. What was the effect? Money overflowed in the Treasury, so that the utmost extravagance of Congress was insufficient to get rid of it.

He heard an honorable member of the other House say that it would be better to raise this money and throw it into the ocean than not to keep up the protecting tariff. What followed? Why, in spite of the most extravagant appropriations, Congress could not possibly expend the accumulated surplus. Two propositions were made to dispose of it: one was for all sorts of extravagant expenditures, and the other was the plain, simple, honest plan of returning it to the people from whom it came; and that was the deposit act. The possession of the surplus was the curse, and those who had voted for the tariff laws of 1824 and 1828 were responsible. This act arrested the surplus revenue, and more, it stopped the transfer of millions of the public acres into the hands of the speculators, who got hold of the public money and with it bought up the public domain. This was the true state of things, and he was glad of having an opportunity of making this explanation. Then the banks suspended specie payments, and this had been attributed to the deposit act. He wished to speak with candor. He had no doubt that the deposit act and the specie circular accelerated the explosion of the banks; but in accelerating it it limited the evil; for if the explosion had been delayed six months longer the calamity would have been threefold greater. It had been said that the Treasury was destitute of money. He admitted that the Government was forced into the necessary virtue of economy, and instead of being able to expend millions extravagantly, it must now limit its expenses to just and necessary objects. But he spoke what every man knew when he said that there had been a melancholy deterioration of the public morals for the last ten or twelve years, and this had arisen from the injurious policy of drawing more money from the people than was necessary for the Government. He would not dwell longer on this question, but would only remark that, when the future historian came to write the history of this country from 1824 to this time, this measure, so condemned now, would be considered as one of the wisest and best measures that had ever been brought before Congress. In all this he wished to be understood as saying that there was not a man in that Chamber who was more opposed to a distribution than he was. He resorted to it as a remedy rendered imperiously necessary by the existing state of things. The act having accomplished its object, he was willing that it should be repealed, and the sooner it was done the better.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, concurred in some things said on both sides, and differed in several. Whatever might have been the motives of others, he voted for it as an act of distribution. He did not share in the grief expressed for its passage; he had no regrets about his vote on this measure. He thought with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that it had been of much benefit. He voted for it with the view and belief that the money was a gift from the Government to the States. His only regret was, that the fourth installment was not paid; that the States had not the nine millions due them from the Government. He said the tariff was not the cause of the surplus, and the subsequent embarrassments of the country. It was the result of fatal "experiments" of the executive branch of the Government. There was another measure—the land bill—that would have prevented a surplus. This bill, which had passed both branches of the Legislature, but which General Jackson retained in his possession—and which he had no doubt would have received the sanction of the constitutional majority of Congress, had it been returned—would have prevented a surplus. There would have been no distribution of a surplus, and no demoralization of public morals. The distribution act was necessary and proper, and should be called an act to save from wasteful and extravagant expenditure the amount of money so deposited with the States. He thought that the installment due to the States could be paid, and paid in the time proposed in his amendment. It could be paid by strict economy in expenditures. Bring down the annual expenditures to the $13,000,000 of Mr. Adams's administration, or even to the $15,000,000 proposed by the administration of General Jackson in 1831. Stop the leaks! Stop the leaks in the Treasury. Stop the flying sub-treasurers, and my life on it, you will have abundance of means to meet the installment. Mr. C., in conclusion, hoped that Senators friendly to the Administration, would express their opinions plainly upon this subject—whether they are in favor of a limited or perpetual postponement. He should be glad to hear the sentiments of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT, in reply, said that with regard to the bill, the Committee on Finance, so far as he was aware, had, in reporting it, conformed to what they believed to be the views of a very large majority of the Senate. He would now frankly answer the question asked by the gentleman from Kentucky. If the bill, as reported, should be passed by that body, the gentleman must never expect him to vote for the payment of this fourth installment, should the question ever come up. He voted against the whole bill when it was first before them, and he was equally opposed to the principle that it contained now. Though he impeached the motives of no man who differed with him in opinion, he had changed no opinion that he held when the subject was first brought before them; and if called on to make this distribution, he never could give his consent to do it. He hoped the Senator considered himself answered; for, so far as he was concerned, he had given him an answer. He had remarked that the committee felt bound, in reporting this bill, to act with regard to the known opinions of a majority of that body; and he hoped that so long as he continued a member of it they would always be disposed to frame their bills in conformity with the known sense of the body, so far as their sense of duty could conform to it. These were the feelings which had always governed him; and it was in accordance with them that he had reported the bills of this and the last session on the subject before them. The Senate had changed the bill of the last session, and they could do so now. The Senator from Kentucky asked, again and again, if we were afraid to trust Congress? Why, if this bill passed as reported, would it not be in the power of Congress to repeal it? Even if the bill passed, what was a law of Congress against Congress itself? But (said Mr. W.) we propose to delay the payment at our own pleasure, and the terms of the amendment were to delay it till the 1st of January, 1840. Now, was there any one present who believed that there would be money in the Treasury to pay this installment by that time? Not only was there no money to pay this installment now, but every one believed that there would not be any by the 1st of January, 1840. This was the true state of the case, and on it he was content to rest the question.

Mr. RIVES was in favor of the amendment. He said an attempt had been made to show that the proposition before the Senate was very different from the deposit act; he could not see the difference. He was not surprised at the course the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BERTON] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] had taken on this question; they had opposed it from the first, and were consistent on this point; but, for his own part, whatever might be the course of others who had supported the bill, he would never do anything that would look like a condemnation—an ex post facto condemnation—of that act of high legislation. He thought that there never had an act of more beneficial influence emanated from congressional legislation. He was not prepared to say that the fourth installment would not be paid. He thought there was a greater probability of its being paid than at the last session, when a measure similar to the one proposed was adopted by Congress. In voting for it he did not consider that we were pledged to pay the installment at the time specified in the amendment; his idea was that it should be paid whenever the Government was in funds. He thought that so long as this idea of a payment of the fourth installment of deposit—for it was strictly a deposit—was held up, the executive would not require extravagant appropriations, because they will not furnish means to enlarge executive power or promote executive views. He said that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his late report on the finances, had been reading a lecture to Congress on bringing the revenue down to the wants of the Government; but the responsibility of extravagant expenditures must be shared by the Executive with Congress. He deemed it a consideration of public morality to postpone the payment of the deposit rather than obliterate the law from the statute-book.

Mr. BROWN did not rise to discuss the question, already so amply debated, whether the payment of the fourth installment to the States, under the deposit act of 1836, should be postponed, as proposed by the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, or whether the amendment offered to it should be adopted. One or two other questions of great importance, connected with our financial affairs, had been touched on, and it was his purpose to say a few words in reference to them.

He would take leave to correct a very gross error which had been fallen into by two or three gentlemen in the course of the debate, in which the advocacy of the principle of distribution among the several States had been attributed to President Jackson in some of his early messages to Congress. So far from having sanctioned it, he had expressly questioned the constitutional power of the Government to raise money for any such object. He recommended it under two contingencies: first, if there should happen to be an unavoidable accumulation of surplus money in the Treasury, as one of the means of getting rid of it; secondly, if an amendment to the Constitution should be first procured authorizing it. Nor was it recommended subject even to these two contingencies alone, without, at that time, there should be a failure on the part of Congress to bring down the revenue to a proper standard of expenditure, which was strongly enjoined by him in several of his annual messages, and, as he should presently show, made one of the leading measures of his Administration.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had, in the course of his remarks, paid a tribute to the economy, alleged to have been practiced in the administration of Mr. Adams, and which he endeavors to contrast to the disadvantage of his successors. It would be recollected that the tariff act of 1828, one of the most outrageous acts of oppression ever practiced on a free people, and which extorted from the pockets of the people the means of extravagance, and consequently created an uncontrollable necessity to get rid of them in some way, was one of the fruits of that most just and economical Administration. It will be recollected, also, that the magnificent and unconstitutional schemes for using these means, ay, and which, to have effected them, would have required millions more of taxes, were, for the first time in this country, hatched under that Administration. The basis of a mighty system of internal improvement was laid by it, by innumerable surveys for railroads and canals, and the commencement of innumerable plans. Who, therefore, in all truth and justice, is responsible for the extravagant direction, thus forced on this Government? Undoubtedly the administration of Mr. Adams, by whose act, and by whose sanction, this enormous amount of money was raised, which the Government was compelled to get rid of in some way. Is it now to be said that the political party who mainly contributed to that disastrous state of things, and whose efforts to run the Government expenditures up to their highest point, and whose progress towards that favorite result in their policy, was powerfully restrained by the constitutional negative of the late President, are the economical party? This cannot be done until the voice of truth is silenced, and the public documents forgotten. At the session of Congress in 1831, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report on the finances, carrying out the principle assumed by President Jackson, that the revenue of the Government should be brought down to a proper standard of expenditure, after presenting a variety of views in support of that proposition, comes to the conclusion that "an annual revenue of fifteen millions will be fully adequate."

By this measure, proposed as an Administration measure, and viewed as an Administration measure at the time, and for which it was severely denounced by many of the modern economists, the administration of President Jackson attempted an annual reduction of about fifteen million dollars, as the revenue then accruing under the measure sanctioned by Mr. Adams amounted to at least thirty million dollars annually, and often afterwards exceeded that amount. Where then were the lecturers on economy? Opposed to the reduction, and in favor of keeping up the enormous income of the Government! At the head of that party stood the Senator from Kentucky, combating for his favorite system. If it could then have been reduced, if the policy of the Administration had then prevailed, the country would not only have been relieved from an oppressive burden, but the means for extravagance would have been withheld, and the Government expenditures, as a matter of course, kept in their true limits. It is not, therefore, for those to complain who are the true authors of the evils, which were inevitable from their own course of action.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PIERCE] has also (said Mr. B.) favored us with a lecture on economy. Mr. B. expressed his solemn conviction that if the yeas and nays on the Journals of the two branches of Congress were examined for the last nine years, the political party with whom that gentleman is now associated, as a body, would be found to be the perpetrators of the offense which he now denounces. He would cite a very few examples, as illustrative of the truth of what he said. On the question of passing the bill giving $5,000,000 for indemnifying certain merchants for spoliation committed by the French prior to 1801, and which, in his opinion, was without the shadow of claim on the justice of Congress, the vote by which it passed the Senate was almost entirely given by the political party opposed to the Administration, while only two or three Senators friendly to the Administration voted for it. The House of Representatives fortunately arrested it. At the last session, in the other branch of Congress, an additional sum of $2,000,000 beyond that given in the treaty, was proposed to be voted to the Cherokee Indians by a gentleman of the Opposition.

Nor was the Senator from South Carolina, now so strongly smitten with a passionate love of economy, altogether free from the sin which he rebukes. Some two sessions since, if he did not err in his recollection, that gentleman proposed an appropriation of $40,000 for purchasing a collection of old paintings, supposed, by better connoisseurs than himself, to have come to this country, from Europe, on a voyage of discovery for a better market, where they, in all probability, were a kind of refuse among those skilled in the fine arts. The same gentleman, he believed, also moved an appropriation of a large sum to purchase the library of the Italian Count Bortullini; and, indeed, from a knowledge of that gentleman's votes in regard to such objects, and in regard to the numerous claims preferred at every session to draw money from the Treasury, he thought it would be difficult to make an appeal to his feelings which would not meet with success from the magnificence and profusion of his generosity. What he complained of was, those who had been the greatest offenders themselves, were now not very candidly endeavoring to impute the offense to others. He could not, so far as these repeated imputations of extravagance tended to identify him with them, hear them with patience or composure. He had, for the last nine years, steadily voted against appropriations for objects of internal improvements. He had almost in every instance, if not in every one, voted against harbor bills, which have been one of the largest items of expense, because they had almost invariably contained some appropriations that he believed unconstitutional. He had voted against the act in 1832, by which the militia of the Revolution were pensioned, which had run the item of pensions up to a sum of more than four millions annually, and which was at that time viewed by him as one of the means by which the tariff party sought to keep up a high tariff by increasing expenditure. Yet many of the individuals who voted for that most extravagant measure now talk about an increase of the public expenditures as if they themselves had not been the chief agents of doing it! He had not only voted against extravagant expenditures, but he had made it a cardinal rule of his action to vote against creating any addition to the number of officers under the Federal Government, unless indispensable to the execution of some new law required, as he thought, by the good of the country.

He was gratified to hear gentlemen speak of economy who had practiced so little of it. It had uniformly been his doctrine in every situation of his public life. He hoped that they would, in good faith, unite in carrying it out into practice, and not "keep the promise to the ear, and break it to the hope."

The Senator from Kentucky, in his remarks of to-day, repudiates the doctrine attributed to him by gentlemen in debate, of wishing to raise money for purposes other than the wants of the Government; but, at the same time, again enforces upon our attention the merits of his bill for the distribution of the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands among the several States. What is this but substantially a proposition to increase the tariff? It is now very clear, under the operation of the gradual decrease of the duties, that the money accruing from all sources, the public lands included, will not be more than sufficient to meet a reasonable system of public expenditure, under the General Government. It therefore follows, as a most undeniable and conclusive consequence, if the money arising from the public lands is taken from the public Treasury and given to the States, that just so much more must be raised from the people of the States to supply the deficiency, which can be done only in one of two ways, either by a system of direct taxation or an increase of the tariff. The bill of the Senator, therefore, is emphatically a tariff measure in its end and effect. It should be entitled "a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, to raise the duties on imports, and for other purposes," &c. The South never can consent to revive a system, either directly or indirectly, which had annihilated her prosperity for years, and converted her planters into mere stewards of their own estates for the benefit of others; a system, the ruin of which to her best interests is most palpably demonstrated from the fact that in proportion as it goes down her prosperity is rapidly recovering. He repeated, that the South never could consent to see it revived, openly or otherwise, unless she was prepared for self-destruction and self-immolation.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the subject was postponed until Monday next.

PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That the bill for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands be referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to consider the same in a financial point of view, and to report their opinion on the probable effect thereof in diminishing or increasing the revenue from the public lands.

On motion, the Senate adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 13, 1838.

Mr. ALEXANDER moved to correct the Journal as to one of his votes yesterday; as did also Mr. PLUMER, Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, and Mr. CHAMBERS.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House—

1. A communication from the Secretary of the Navy, stating the number of extra clerks which have been employed in that Department, in answering calls for information.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

2. From the same, containing a statement of the contingent expenses of that Department for the last year.

On motion of Mr. REED, laid on the table.

3. From the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Fifth Auditor on the progress made in building light-houses, buoys, &c.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CAMERLENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations in part for the support of Government for the year 1838, (the congressional compensation bill); which was read twice, and committed.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to submit the following:

Resolved, That the powers of Congress being conferred by the Constitution of the United States, no resolution of this House can add to or deduct from them.

Objection being made by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky,

Mr. ADAMS moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; whereupon

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, withdrew his objection; but it was renewed by another gentleman.

The House refused to suspend the rules; the vote being—yeas 75, nays 124; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Halstead, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Jenifer, William Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Sampson Mason, May, Maxwell, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Slade, Southgate, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, Wise, Word, and Yorke—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, John Calhoun, Cambrleng, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clark, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kenble, Klingensmith, Legare, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Pratt, Rencher, Rhett, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffield, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stanley, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vandever, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, John White, Whittelsey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yell—124.

So the motion to suspend the rules was decided in the negative.

STEAM EXPLOSIONS.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of steam explosions was laid before the House by the Speaker; which was referred to a select committee, and ordered to be printed by the Printer of the House, under the superintendence of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized to make any additions and corrections he may think fit during the progress of the printing.

The committee was ordered to consist of seven in number.

PLAN OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

On motion of Mr. KEMBLE, it was Ordered, That the small drawing or map illustrative of the plan of national defense, contained in the report of the Secretary of War, which accompanies the President's message, be published in the other documents.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. WISE asked leave to submit the following resolutions, as propositions containing his sentiments, and what he believed to be the real sentiments of the whole South:

1. Resolved, That Congress has no power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories of the United States; whether such power in the said District or Territories be exercised "as a means, or with the view, of disturbing and overthrowing slavery in the States" or not.

2. Resolved, That Congress has no power to abolish the slave trade, or prohibit the removal of slaves between the States, or between the States and the District of Columbia or Territories of the United States.

3. Resolved, That Congress cannot receive or consider petitions for the exercise of any powers whatever over the subject of slavery which Congress does not possess.

4. Resolved, That the laws of Congress alone govern in prescribing and regulating the mode and manner in which fugitive slaves shall be apprehended, and their rights to freedom held in the non-slaveholding States, District of Columbia, and Territories; and the mode and manner in which they shall be restored or delivered to their owners in the slave States.

5. Resolved, That Congress has no power to impose upon any State the abolition of slavery in its limits, as a condition of admission into this Union.

6. Resolved, That the citizens of the slaveholding States of this Union have the constitutional right voluntarily to take their slaves to or through a non-slaveholding State; and to sojourn or remain temporarily with such slaves in the same, and the slaves are not thereby ipso facto emancipated; and the General Government is constitutionally bound to protect the rights of slaveholding States; and that laws of non-slaveholding States in conflict with the laws of Congress providing for such protection, are null and void.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, asked the gentleman to accept some he held in his hand as a modification of his own.

Mr. WISE hoped his friend would not embarrass him. He had consulted one of his colleagues; and, in asking leave to introduce these propositions, he would not only pledge himself not to debate them, but he would move, what he deprecated, the previous question.

Mr. RIVES inquired if they did not fall within the scope of the last resolution adopted yesterday? [ordering all papers on the subject of slavery to be laid upon the table.]

The SPEAKER replied that the resolutions were not yet before the House, the motion being for leave to introduce them.

MEMBERS said, "Object to them!"

Mr. RIVES did so, and Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rules, calling for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 113, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, Ayer, Banks, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Bynum, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Chapman, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Coles, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Dennis, Dunn, Elmore, Evans, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, John W. Jones, Kennedy, Legare, Lewis, Lincoln, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Sampson Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Moore, Murray, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Pearce, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Slade, Southgate, Staley, Stuart, Stone, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Towns, John White, Whittelsey, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yell—113.

NAYS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beers, Belme, Bicknell, Birdsall, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambrleng, Casey, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Invee, Davies, Deberry, Dromgoole, Duncan, Everett, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Gray, Haley, Halstead, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Herod, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kenble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Loomis, Marvin, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Montgomery, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Phelps, Plumer, Pratt, Rariden, Reily, Rives, Russell, Sheffield, Shepler, Sibley, Snyder, Spencer, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Vandever, Wagoner, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, and Jared W. Williams—96.

So the motion to suspend was decided in the negative; there not being two thirds voting for the motion.

Mr. SLADE asked leave to submit the following:

Whereas, there exists and is carried on between the ports in the District of Columbia and other parts of the United States, and under the sanction of the laws thereof, a trade in human beings, whereby thousands of them are annually sold and transported from said District to distant parts of the country, in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States; and whereas, such trade involves an outrageous violation of human rights, is a disgrace to the country by whose laws it is sanctioned, and calls for the immediate interposition of legislative authority for its suppression: Therefore, to the end that all obstacles to the consideration of this subject may be removed, and a remedy for the evil speedily provided,

Resolved, That so much of the fifth of the resolutions on the subject of slavery, passed by this House on the 11th and 12th of the present month, as relates to the "removal of slaves from State to State," and prohibits the action of this House on "every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper touching" the same, be, and hereby is, rescinded.

Objection being made,

Mr. SLADE moved to suspend the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 55, nays 157; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davee, Davies, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Lincoln, Samson Mason, McKennan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Parmenter, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Tillinghast, Toland, and Albert S. White—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsell, Boudin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cray, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dromgoole, Dunn, Elmore, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Gray, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Jennifer, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Phelps, Pickens, Plummer, Pope, Pratt, Reilly, Rencher, Rhett, Rives, Robertson, Rumsey, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Southgate, Spencer, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Swearingen, Tabafarro, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Wagoner, Webster, John White, Whittlesley, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Yell, and Yorke—157.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, asked leave to submit the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill making it unlawful for any person to aid fugitive slaves in escaping from their owners, and providing for the punishment in the courts of the United States of all persons who may be guilty of such offense. And that they be further instructed to report a bill making it unlawful for any person in the non-slaveholding States of this Union to use any means to entice slaves from their owners, and providing for the punishment in the courts of the United States of all persons who may be found guilty of such offense.

Objections were made, and Mr. C. moved for a suspension of the rules, also calling for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 89, nays 107; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Beatty, Bicknell

Biddle, Birdsell, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Childs, Clark, Cranston, Cushing, Cushman, Davee, Davies, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Farrington, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Hammond, Hamer, Henry, Herod, Holt, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Loomis, Marvin, Sampson, Mason, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Milligan, Mitchell, Moore, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Pettkin, Plumer, Potts, Pratt, Rariden, Reed, Reilly, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Sheffer, Shepler, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Snyder, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, Toucey, Vandever, Wagoner, Webster, Albert S. White, Whittlesley, and Jared W. Williams—107.

So the rules were not suspended.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

On motion of Mr. GRENNEILL, the House proceeded to the execution of the order of Monday, for the election of a Chaplain on its part; when the following nominations were made:

Mr. DAVIES nominated Rev. A. Babbitt.
Mr. CRAIG nominated Rev. Levi R. Reese.
Mr. MASON, of Virginia, nominated Rev. E. C. Hutchinson.

Mr. WISE nominated Rev. W. Ford.
Mr. TAYLOR nominated Rev. Mr. Owen.
Mr. CUSHMAN nominated Rev. Mr. Bullfinch.

Mr. GALLUP nominated Rev. Mr. Fowler.
Mr. MERCER nominated Rev. Mr. Tuston.

The first five gentlemen were appointed to superintend the taking the votes; and being taken, they were announced as follows:

Whole number of votes given in, 198; necessary to a choice, 100; of which

Rev. Levi R. Reese received.....	100
Rev. E. C. Hutchinson.....	25
Rev. Mr. Bullfinch.....	25
Rev. A. Babbitt.....	14
Rev. Mr. Tuston.....	14
Rev. Mr. Fowler.....	11
Rev. Mr. Owen.....	9

So Rev. Mr. REESE was declared duly elected.

On motion, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 14, 1838.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions; which, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, was laid on the table.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. CUSHMAN asked leave to submit the following:

Resolved, That no committee of this House shall be permitted to employ a clerk at the public expense, without first obtaining leave of the House for that purpose.

Objection being made,

Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules, which prevailed; and the resolution was agreed to nem. diss.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be authorized to employ a clerk.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into committee (Mr. HOWARD in the chair) on the "bill making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1838-9."

The bill having been read,

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the contingent expenses of the House and Senate had been limited to one half their estimates, leaving the other half for future consideration.

The bill was ordered to be reported.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

Subsequently, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, engrossed bill "making partial appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1838-9" was read a third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOWARD inquired if, this being private business day, petitions could be presented?

The SPEAKER replied that petitions were in order each day for the first thirty days of the session.

Mr. HOWARD hoped they would go on with that business, so that the committees might have some business before them.

Mr. ELMORE made an ineffectual effort to induce the House to take up, on their reference, some private bills from the Senate lying on the Speaker's table.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Petitions and memorials were then called for in the order of States, commencing at the point left off the other day, and were presented by Messrs. ATHERTON and FARRINGTON, of New Hampshire.

Mr. CUSHING presented several memorials, and asked leave to bring in a bill to provide for the protection of the citizens of the United States residing in Oregon Territory; but it being objected to, Mr. C. gave the requisite notice of one day.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Massachusetts, then presented a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WISE rose and objected to its reception; and said he would make the point of order whether Mr. ATHERTON's fifth resolution recognized the reception of petitions.

The SPEAKER said this question had been decided at the second session of the Twenty-Fourth Congress on a reversal of the decision of the Chair at that time, upon an appeal therefrom, by a vote of—yeas 56, nays 147. In view of that decision, the Chair now felt constrained to put a similar construction upon the present order, and thereby overrule the point made by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WISE said he knew that, under the resolutions adopted in previous years, these petitions had been received. But this was a new resolution.

The SPEAKER said it amounted to the same thing. They were substantially and almost in the identical phraseology.

Mr. WISE. Well, then, if that be the decision of the Chair, in order to test the sense of the House, I take an appeal, having no other mode of reaching it; and also call for the yeas and nays. Now, I wish gentlemen to come up to their own construction of their own resolution. He himself believed the decision of the Chair to be in conformity with the resolution; but he had taken the appeal that the opinion of each member might be known. Mr. W. then went into a succinct history of the proceedings on the several resolutions on this subject, from Mr. JARVIS's and Mr. PINCKNEY's original one to refer the matter to a select committee, down to those of the latter gentlemen, Mr. HAWES, and Mr. PATTON, making, eo tempore, a final disposition of abolition papers.

The question now involved, according to Mr. W., was this: was the presentation of a petition under Mr. ATHERTON's resolution a reception of it? Southern gentlemen who voted for that resolution had declared to him that the resolution did not recognize the reception of abolition petitions. Now, he wished them to stand by that decision. If, on the contrary, this House does affirm that that resolution recognizes the reception of these petitions, then the whole ground is gone, and the Abolitionists have triumphed; because, if you may receive petitions, you may refer them; and referring, you may report on them—unfavorably, you may say; but if you have the power to report at all, you may report favorably, as well as unfavorably. This, he repeated, gave up the whole ground to the Abolitionists. His own candid opinion was, that the wording of the resolution laying the petitions on the table did recognize their reception. Now, he would ask the South if this was the compact, if this was the boon, which at last the South had gained from a northern party with southern principles? If this be the compact, (namely, to recognize the jurisdiction of Congress over the subject of slavery, except directly in the slaveholding States,) it is a compact nothing better than abolition itself.

The SPEAKER recapitulated all the questions that had arisen, and the decisions on the similar points, under the four resolutions referred to above, in all of which the uniform construction had been that the resolution or order, the same as that now in force, disposed of the petition on presentation, and that the question of reception could not be raised at that time.

Mr. RIVES expressed his deep regret that after the adoption of Mr. ATHERTON's resolutions any further excitement should have sprung up in that House. He had been of opinion that, under these resolutions, they could have got on quietly and tranquilly during the rest of the session, and he believed every person acquiesced in them. He believed every man in the slaveholding States, with the exception of a few fanatics—

VOL. 7...No. 3.

The SPEAKER arrested Mr. R. as transgressing the limits of the question of order.

Mr. RIVES would cheerfully yield submission to the Chair. Then, (continued Mr. R.) the gentleman who made this appeal himself concurred with the Speaker, and why, then, persist in it? He ought not to have made it.

Mr. R.'s conviction was that the Chair ought to be sustained, and his impression was that the only way by which the gentleman could have attained his object, was by a direct motion to reject, and not to have brought up the subject of resolutions already adopted. Mr. R. hoped the yeas and nays would be ordered, and in voting he would endeavor to set his colleague an example, by responding when his name was called.

Mr. PICKENS maintained that there was a wide distinction between the present resolution of order and those adopted in former years. He differed with Mr. WISE in his view of it, contending that the words "without further action thereon," created this distinction, and left the question of reception untouched. There was even a still prior preliminary question, uniformly acted on in the British Parliament, from which their lex parliamentaria was derived, but which had been left unnoticed by Mr. Jefferson—the leave to present. That was the first question, and then came the question of reception. The member holding the paper makes no motion to that effect, but the Chair was bound to present the question to the House for its decision.

The gentleman from Virginia had alluded to a compact. Mr. P. could assure the gentleman that he had consulted no man, in or out of the House, but his own colleagues.

Mr. P. then briefly recapitulated the course before taken by the House, and insisted that the question of rejection was never decided according to strict parliamentary usage. It was left in abeyance, for when it was raised it was immediately followed up by a motion to lay on the table, and thus the whole matter was disposed of. He agreed with the gentleman from Virginia that the question of reception was one of vital importance to the South, and one which he would never surrender. The clause he had referred to preserved that question, and but for that he should not have voted for Mr. ATHERTON's resolutions.

Mr. ROBERTSON had voted for that resolution with the impression that it did not conclude the question of reception, but left it open in the event that "further action" should be proposed on these petitions. He thought the Chair right in deciding that the question of reception could not now be entertained, but that the memorials must go on the table. But if the House should decide on further action on them, would the Chair consider it precluded from raising the question of reception?

The SPEAKER said it had not so decided. When that question should come up, it would be time enough to decide it.

Mr. ROBERTSON expressed himself satisfied with that view of the point, concurring, as it did, with his own.

Mr. GLASCOCK agreed with Mr. WISE in his motion, and was also of opinion that the construction given to Mr. ATHERTON's resolution by the Chair, was in strict conformity not only with its own obvious meaning, but according to the spirit and intent of the whole of the other similar resolutions. In looking at this resolution, it will be found that all memorials, &c., on the subject of slavery, or abolition, &c., shall be laid on the table without being printed, referred, or any further action thereon. Now when that resolution was presented for consideration, he took the same position he had always maintained on questions of this kind before, and declined voting upon it, one way or the other, until he could examine and judge for himself whether it could bear such a construction as to recognize the reception of petitions. He believed it did admit of that construction, and therein he differed with his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.] It seemed to Mr. G. that when a petition was presented, and then ordered to lie on the table, it was, to all intents and purposes, ipso facto received. The act of disposing of a paper after presentation, presupposed its reception by the body making a disposition of it. Any other construction would be to render the resolution itself a mere nullity. This seemed to him one of the plainest propositions ever presented to a deliberative assembly. The laying on the table was no preliminary stage, but a final disposition of the subject, or tantamount to it, because no further action could be had thereon but by a suspension of the rules. No disposition could be made of a subject unless it was in the possession of the House; and to be in their possession, it must have been received. He contended that the resolution would have borne this construction without the words "further action," which necessarily implied previous action; but those words put it beyond doubt. He refused to vote for Mr. PICKNEY's resolution because it recognized the reception of petitions, and he had declined voting for Mr. ATHERTON's on the same ground.

Mr. CRAIG considered Mr. WISE's ground to be the true one, viz: that the presentation of a petition, which presentation resulted in its being laid on the table, was in effect, to put that petition in possession of the House, for he was at a loss to perceive how it could get there without being received. Still, however, he denied, toto cælo, that it was a concession to the petitioners of their right to petition. It was, on the contrary, a virtual denial of their right, and a rejection of their memorial. If he understood the Speaker's decision rightly, it was this: that when a petition gets on the table, the question of its reception cannot be raised, because pro tanto it is already received and disposed of, and that decision he should sustain.

Mr. TAYLOR, remarking that the case appeared to him to be too clear even to allow room for an argument against it, demanded the previous question, which was seconded, 99 to 62, and the main question ordered, put, and carried—yeas 185, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. NAYS—Messrs. Carter, Chambers, Crockett, Pope, Christopher H. Williams, and Word—6.

Mr. ADAMS, when his name was called, said: I refuse to answer, considering all the resolutions—

The SPEAKER called Mr. A. to order.

Mr. ADAMS. Considering all the resolutions as unconstitutional—

The SPEAKER again interposed, and requested the gentleman from Massachusetts to take his seat.

Mr. ADAMS. A violation of the Constitution of the United States.

These words were thrown out by Mr. A. amidst much tumult, and very loud cries for "order," in the course of which,

The SPEAKER called on the House to aid him. Something like silence having been restored, Mr. THOMPSON desired to know what aid the Speaker wished?

Mr. ADAMS having, in the interim, resumed his seat,

The SPEAKER replied, none at all. The Clerk then proceeded with the roll, and, the name of Mr. WISE having been called, that gentleman rose and refused to vote.

Mr. MERCER, on leave, submitted a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That all petitions and memorials presented to this House at the regular session of Congress, and referred to the several standing committees, on which no report was made, or in relation to which bills were reported, may be again referred to the same committees, at the pleasure of the members by whom they were respectively presented, on being laid, or a list thereof presented, to the Clerk.

Mr. TURNEY moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "memorial," the words "papers and resolutions;" which was disagreed to.

Mr. LOOMIS proposed to amend the resolution by adding after the word "House," the words "for want of action thereon;" and, after a conversation in which Messrs. LOOMIS, GARLAND of Virginia, and ADAMS partook, the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MERCER then modified his resolution so as to read "last" instead of "regular" session.

Mr. HARLAN moved that the resolution lie upon the table; which motion was not agreed to. The resolution, as modified by the mover, was then agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, it was Resolved, That when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

PRIVATE BILLS.

On motion of Mr. ELMORE, sundry private bills from the Senate were taken up and referred.

JOINT LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

The House took up and concurred in the resolution from the Senate for the appointment of a Joint Library Committee, and ordered a committee of three to be appointed on its part.

HALF-PAY PENSIONS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, on leave, presented the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act passed the 7th day of July, 1838, entitled "An act granting half pay and pensions to certain widows," so that the benefits thereof may not be withheld from said widows for having married after the decease of the husband for whose services she may claim to be allowed a pension, if she would otherwise be entitled thereto.

On motion of Mr. BOULDIN, the House adjourned.

The following gentlemen compose the select committee on steam-engines: Messrs. SERGEANT, HAMER, CAMPBELL of South Carolina, PHELPS, MENEFFEE, YELL, and BORDEN.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 17, 1838.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the Fifth Auditor in reference to the erection of light-houses, buoys, &c., in compliance with the act of July 7, 1838; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Pensions, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1838; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the claim of Lieutenant Collins, concerning a survey of the southern coast; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of William M. Perkins and others, remonstrating against making Indian Key a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of sundry officers of the line of the Army, praying to be allowed the same pay and emoluments as officers of the staff; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LYON presented the petition of Benjamin H. Wheelock, Frederic H. Stevens, Charles Taylor, Samuel Denton, and Edward Mundy, praying for the preemption right to a fraction of a section of land on which they have erected a steam saw-mill, in Ottawa county, Michigan.

Also, the memorial of Edwin H. Lathrop, agent of the county of Kalamazoo, in Michigan, praying that the act of the 26th of May, 1824, granting to the counties and parishes of each State where the public lands are situated, the right of preemption to quarter sections of land, for seats of justice, be so construed as to extend to said county a similar privilege.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of John M. Hepburn, a clerk in the office of the Adjutant General, praying for increase of his salary; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Mrs. Hutchins, widow of a soldier of the late war, who died in the service of the United States, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the petition of James H. Bradford, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TIPTON presented the petition of a number of citizens of Indiana, asking for a grant of land to aid them in constructing a railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of William Crawford; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of James F. Baldwin, executor of Loammi Baldwin, deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of a number of citizens of Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of Wilfred Nott; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of Eunice Starr, widow of William Starr, a soldier of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The PRESIDENT communicated several papers in support of the claim of Samuel H. Thompson; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of Dr. William Thomas, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIVES presented the petition of certain officers of the revenue cutters of the United States, asking to be placed on the same footing, as to pay and emoluments, as the officers of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of — Ferguson; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. ROBINSON gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to establish a surveyor general's office in the State of Illinois.

Mr. DAVIS gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Irvine Shubrick.

Mr. RIVES gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to explain and amend the act for the better organization of the United States marine corps.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of certain persons therein named.

Mr. HUBBARD gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Dr. Samuel White.

Mr. NORVELL gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a joint resolution to authorize the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made.

Also, a bill to authorize the University of Michigan to select other lands in lieu of those granted them.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, leave was given to Sarah Bowen to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the last session.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the memorial of John M. Moore, on the files of the last session, was again referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the petition of John H. Hall, on the files of the last session, was again referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the petition and papers of Zephaniah Spiggot, on the files of the last session, were again referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the petition and papers of George Taylor, on the files of the last session, were again referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. STRANGE, the petition and papers of Dr. Cameron on the files of the last session, were again referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the petition of David Stone, on the files of the last session, was again referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of John W. Skidmore and others; which was read twice and referred.

Also, a bill for the relief of Isabella Hill and others; also, a bill for the relief of Ephraim Sprague; which were severally read twice and referred.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to amend the act entitled an act to amend the several acts in relation to copyrights; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. MERRICK, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to provide for a free bridge across the Eastern Branch, at the city of Washington; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. ROANE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a joint resolution directing the manner in which certain laws of the District of Columbia shall be executed; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. LYON, on leave, introduced a bill to amend the act for the confirmation of certain land claims in Michigan; which was read twice and referred.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. FULTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing ports of entry at Batesville, Little Rock, and Fulton, in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making specific appropriations for the improvement of the Rock river and Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river, so as to make said river navigable for steamboats at all seasons of the year when the navigation of the same is not obstructed by ice.

Mr. WALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to the Senate the sums of money paid out of the Treasury under private appropriations made or private bills passed by Congress, since the first Monday in December, 1833, distinguishing the amount thereof made at each session of Congress, during the said period, and the persons to whom, and for what purpose paid; and, also, what sums, if any, remain unpaid.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to report to the Senate at the commencement of the next stated session of Congress the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with all foreign nations, so as to show how far the commerce and navigation of this Republic are favored and encouraged, or burdened and restricted, in different countries.

The resolution was laid over.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to defray the expenses of calling into service Captain Shodgrass's company of Alabama volunteers, to serve as a guard in accompanying a party of emigrating Cherokees from Bellefonte to Waterloo, in the State of Alabama.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several States embracing the public lands, as soon as the surveys, plats, &c., can be completed; and, also, to inquire into the expediency of establishing land districts in which the public lands have been sold, or in which the sales have become inadequate to defray the expenses of the land officers therein, or to annex such districts to others necessary to be continued.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, with an amendment, the bill for the relief of the owners of the brig Despatch.

Also, without amendment, the bill to reward the captors of the privateer Lydia.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill "providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands," with instructions to consider the same in a financial point of view, and to report their opinion on the probable effect thereof in diminishing or increasing the revenue from the public lands, made the following report:

That, on being charged with this inquiry, the committee deemed it proper to communicate with the officer at the head of the Treasury Department, and to obtain the benefit of his opinion on the point submitted to them. That officer has replied, and has given it as his opinion that the effect of the bill for some time to come—to wit, for a period from five to ten years—would be to accelerate the sales of the lands to which the bill applies, and, consequently, to augment the amount of revenue receivable from that source. In this opinion the committee fully concur, and believe that the state of the revenue for some years to come will be precisely such as to demand and require this opportune augmentation of income from the public lands. The reduction of duties on imports, now in a regular course of diminution under the act which is commonly called the "compromise," will attain its ultimate point of depression in the year 1842, and will reduce the revenue derived from the customs, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the low amount of ten or twelve million dollars by that time. To supply this deficiency, an increased revenue from lands becomes highly desirable; and the accelerated sales of the old lands which have been long in market, and sell slowly at the present minimum price, are the obvious means of effecting that increase; and a reduction of price, as proposed in the bill, is the natural and effectual method of accelerating these sales.

The whole quantity of land which would fall under the operation of the bill, according to a report made to Congress at its last session, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, would be seventy-one million acres, distributed over nine States and one Territory, in the following proportions:

Ohio .....	1,785,035
Indiana .....	4,418,088
Illinois .....	12,714,963
Missouri .....	13,162,545
Alabama .....	14,523,269
Mississippi .....	6,841,553
Louisiana .....	5,018,292
Michigan .....	2,217,185
Arkansas .....	6,304,612
Florida .....	3,998,521
Total .....	71,004,063

The length of time for which different portions of the said lands had been offered for sale at private entry, without finding a purchaser, were stated, in the same report to be—

States.	For five years and under.	For ten years and under.	For fifteen years and under.	For twenty years and upwards.	Amount.
Ohio.....	139	2,764	905,833	876,338	1,755,035
Indiana.....	576,164	486,544	628,485	2,716,893	4,418,088
Illinois.....	1,977,947	1,293,912	4,720,885	4,759,619	12,714,963
Missouri.....	2,290,107	6,567,030	5,395,399	13,183,545	29,182,989
Alabama.....	3,487,775	2,914,622	6,513,931	1,606,940	14,522,969
Mississippi.....	1,357,365	1,120,492	81,921	4,983,443	6,841,553
Louisiana.....	3,032,842	410,296	1,606,153	5,018,292	9,217,185
Michigan.....	1,507,433	373,771	335,931	-	2,217,135
Arkansas.....	1,515,778	2,989,268	1,802,544	-	6,307,612
Florida.....	2,993,900	1,195,621	-	-	3,998,521

Considering that these lands lie dispersed through nine States and one Territory; that they extend from the northern lakes to the Gulf of Mexico; that they lie intermixed with the cultivated lands of several millions of farmers and planters, to whom they must be desirable, although of inferior value, provided they can be obtained at prices adapted to their worth, the committee feel justified in believing that the bill would accelerate their sale, and thereby supply the deficiency of a declining revenue from customs; and therefore recommend the passage of the bill, in a financial point of view, as a measure beneficial to the Treasury, and coming opportunely to its aid.

Such would be the direct and immediate effect of the bill. Its indirect and consequential effect would also be beneficial to the Treasury, by bringing into use and cultivation many millions of acres of land, now idle and unproductive, contributing nothing to agriculture, but which, in private hands, would speedily be made productive, and, in swelling the aggregate of national wealth, would augment the means of replenishing the Treasury.

The committee do not feel themselves called upon to speak of the effect of the bill upon the interests of the States, and upon the welfare and convenience of the people among whom these seventy millions of acres of refuse lands lie; but to show that there can be no conflict between the interests of the Treasury and the interests of the new States and their inhabitants from the passage of the bill, they take leave to give it as their opinion that the measure will be as beneficial to the new States as to the Federal Treasury; that the time has fully arrived when the new States should have the use of these refuse lands for taxation, and their inhabitants should have the use of them for cultivation, and that the whole should become private property; and that this can better be effected by reducing the price to the value of the lands, than by waiting indefinite terms of years for the lands to rise to the present minimum price.

The committee report back the bill with a recommendation to pass it; and they communicate to the Senate the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, with his opinion to the same effect.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the report was ordered to be printed, together with ten thousand extra copies for the use of the Senate.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WALL on Thursday last was considered and adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill from the House making appropriations in part for the support of Government for the year 1838-39, was read twice, and, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAY OF BREVET OFFICERS.

The bill explanatory of the act to regulate the pay and emoluments of brevet officers was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of the heirs of John Brabant, late receiver of public moneys at Huntsville, Alabama;

The bill for the relief of William Jones; and
The bill to establish an additional land office in the State of Alabama.

FOURTH INSTALLMENT OF DEPOSIT.

The bill to postpone the fourth installment of the deposit act was taken up as the order of the day; when

Mr. PRESTON said his object in rising, when this subject was last before the Senate, was to refute and correct a misrepresentation respecting his position in regard to it. He had given his support originally to the measure, but it was as a deposit bill, not as one for distribution. Although aware of the necessity of getting rid of the accumulated surplus, had he known its practical effect he could not, except as an extreme necessity, have voted for it. What he had said the other day was applicable to the bill as it was practically and in effect—a bill for distribution instead of deposit. As a deposit act it provided that the Secretary of the Treasury might reclaim the moneys from the States whenever the exigencies of the Government rendered it necessary; but at a subsequent session it was so amended, at the instance of an honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] as to take this discretion from the Secretary. When it was proposed to create a national debt, he was willing to have moved for the recall of this money. The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] said, that to have recalled it at the last session, during the fiscal embarrassments, would have been ruinous to the States, and that nothing but a foreign war would be a justifiable cause for so doing; but I think that the States could, by their credit, have easily raised means to pay off this debt. Under that state of affairs, Congress decided in favor of a national debt in preference to reclaiming the deposit with the States. One great benefit expected from the operation of this act was, that whenever the Government was disposed to a prodigality of expenditure, the States would be induced to interpose and arrest the evil. Did they do so? It was expected that whenever the wants of the Government required more than their immediate means, these deposits would be a resource for us to draw on to supply the deficiency. Did we do so? No, sir; we have a national debt existing, on which we are paying interest, while the money is still in deposit with the States. Congress has, by its legislation, declared its most unequivocal condemnation of the deposit act. I do not reprobate the bill as passed, but think that, as no human being entertains the idea that this money will be ever paid, the most honest plan will be to strike it from the statute-book altogether.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] has thought proper, in his remarks, to endeavor to make the minority of the body responsible for the acts of the majority; to make us responsible for the acts passed by the majority which they may discover to be evil, and also for the loss of measures which are defeated that they may deem beneficial. In all more party matters the Administration have the majority, and can pass what acts they please. If economy is an Administration measure, the party can give our legislation that tendency. He has also thought proper to refer to my course on the bill appropriating $5,000,000 for French spoils prior to 1800. I cannot understand the economy of refusing to pay an honest debt to an individual who holds my bond. Sir, I would drain your Treasury to the last cent, were it necessary for this purpose. I never supported a niggard economy, that would defeat the ends of Government by straitening the means for an efficient administration of it. The purchase of the library of Count Bourhillini would have reared a noble monument to our literature, and would have been the means of diffusing information which cannot be derived from any other source in the United States. As to the paintings, he did not profess to be a connoisseur in such matters; but his proposition was, to submit the selection of the paintings to competent judges. Though he did not profess to have any great skill in the fine arts, yet he had a taste for paintings; and he thought it much better to ornament the halls of Congress with specimens of the fine arts than with barbaric gold and pearl. He was perfectly willing to incur the opprobrium of that sort of extravagance that adds to the welfare, the honor, or the glory of our common country.

Mr. BROWN, in reply, observed that he would not have made the remarks the gentleman referred to on Thursday last, but for the repeated charges made by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber of extravagance against the Administration and its friends. It was well known that this was one of the great engines by which the Opposition sought to prostrate the Administration; and he felt it, therefore, to be his duty to show that it and its friends were not responsible for the many extravagant appropriations that had been made here. The gentleman tells us (said Mr. B.) that these expenditures have been founded on estimates furnished by the executive departments; but surely the gentleman did not charge the minority with the annual estimates of the Departments; and he surely did not recollect that Congress, in its appropriations of the last session, exceeded the estimates some ten or twelve millions. Surely the gentleman would not say that the Administration was responsible for this excess. When he addressed the Senate last on this subject, he took occasion to say that, if the yeas and nays were examined, it would be found that at least two thirds of those voting for these extravagant expenditures were in the ranks of the Opposition. It was because some few friends of the Administration voted with the great body of the Opposition that these appropriations had been got through. It was well known that, for several years past, this body was nearly in an equilibrium, and that a very few of the Administration party voting with the Opposition enabled them to carry through these appropriations which enabled them since to raise the charge of extravagance against the former. It was with the determination not to suffer himself and the party with which he acted to be identified with these extravagant expenditures that he felt called on to make the explanation which he did on Thursday last. The honorable gentleman surely did not recollect that the friends of the Administration had, until within a few years past, been in a minority in this body; and did the gentleman hold the Administration responsible for expenditures voted for by a majority opposed to it? If he did, it was a new kind of political casuistry not very consistent with justice. The gentleman spoke with regard to the five millions he proposed to give to the merchants for French spoils prior to 1800; also, to the $40,000 he wished to appropriate for the purchase of paintings, as well as the $50,000 he wished to lay out in a library. The gentleman also spoke of his liberal views, and his regard for the fine arts. Now, he had no objection to the gentleman indulging in his liberality, but he certainly did object to his doing so, and afterwards charging the Administration and its friends with the extravagance it led to. He admired the taste of the gentleman for the fine arts; and had no objection to his indulging in it—it was a refined and noble taste; but Congress had no constitutional power to encourage the fine arts; and it was a matter more proper for the exercise of the gentleman's own private liberality.

With regard to the sub-Treasurers to whom the gentleman alluded, and some of whom had escaped from the United States, he would only observe that the gentleman might with great justice have spoken of the banks through whose aid they perpetrated their frauds. It was a part of the deposit bank system, that through the means of these banks, these frauds were so long concealed. It was because the officers of the Government of the United States had no means of looking into the vaults of these banks, that these men were enabled to conceal their defalcations. Had there been a sub-Treasury—if the officers of the Government had had the right of looking into the safety of the public money, there would have been none of these frauds committed. It was because the public money was put in the vaults of the banks, where all scrutiny into its safety was precluded, that these frauds had been so long concealed.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLAY's amendment to postpone the installment to the 1st of January, 1840, and decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merick, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, and Tipton—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—26.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

The following bills were taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill for the relief of William East;

The bill to prevent the counterfeiting of foreign coin, and for the punishment thereof;

The bill to punish certain offenses against the United States;

The bill confirming the sales of certain reservations;

The bill granting to the county of Kalamazoo, State of Michigan, the right of preemption to certain quarter sections of the public lands;

The bill for the relief of John Newton;

The bill for the relief of Jean B. Valle;

The bill for the relief of Laurent B. Millaudon; and

The bill for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay, with an amendment.

The bill for completing certain roads commenced by the United States in the State of Michigan, was taken up, and on the question of ordering it to be engrossed the vote was—yeas 16, nays 16; lost.

Mr. MORRIS gave notice that to-morrow he would move for a reconsideration of this vote.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road was postponed and made the order of the day for Wednesday week.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate went into the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened.

COURT AT JACKSON.

The bill to amend the act to require the judges of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in June, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 17, 1838.

Mr. FRY asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House (if not incompatible with the public interest) whether, since the commencement of the present session of Congress, any call has been made upon the executive department of this Government, by the Governor of Pennsylvania, for an armed force of United States troops, and what (official) correspondence (if any) has taken place between him and the Governor of said State in relation to said call; and whether any arms, powder, ball, or buckshot, or other munitions of war, have been furnished by the United States to any of the troops in Pennsylvania, recently called out by order of the Executive of that State.

Objection being made,

Mr. F. moved a suspension of the rules; on which motion,

Mr. BEATTY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE said if it was in order, he should like the gentleman to state the object of the resolution. Mr. W. did not know that he had any particular objection to it.

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order but by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. FRY said he had no objection if the House would indulge him. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The question was then taken, and the rules were suspended—yeas 138, nays 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. The resolution being before the House,

Mr. CUSHING submitted the following amendment, which Mr. FRY accepted as a modification:

And whether any officer of the United States instigated or participated in certain late riotous proceedings in the State of Pennsylvania, as alleged in the proclamation of the Governor of said State; and what measures, if any, the President has taken to investigate and punish said acts; and whether such officers still remain in the service of the United States.

Mr. BIDDLE said he did not rise to combat this resolution, yet it was to be regretted that, at a time when excitement appeared to be subsiding elsewhere, an attempt should be made to revive it here. Might it not seem abroad to spring from a wish to inflame and exasperate, rather than from a grave and sincere pursuit of information? Why this parade about buckshot, &c.? Did it not betray a feeling which lurked, say unconsciously, beneath a fair outside? He would not be drawn into a discussion of the pretext which had led to violence and outrage, although prepared to do so. It was a cunning device, by long articles which few would take the trouble to master, to distract attention from the point which must cause all thoughtful men to regard these transactions with astonishment and shame. When the mutineers, in 1783, placed men with fixed bayonets at the doors of Congress, and compelled an adjournment to Princeton, no one stopped to inquire what their pretended "grievances" were. There was a burst of indignation over the whole country, and General Washington instantly dispatched a military force to the scene of violence. He would no more pause to examine these pretenses than if the same mob had rushed into the court-house and driven out judge and jury, on the pretended apprehension of an unjust verdict. No one would think it necessary to enter into the details of the case before expressing his deep and honest indignation at what must break up all government and all security for life and property. He repeated his regret that his honorable colleague had thought it expedient thus, like the son of Noah, to lay bare to the derisive gaze of the world that over which a pious tenderness would rather have thrown a mantle.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he should have silently voted for this resolution, if the Democracy of Pennsylvania (who were peaceably resisting the usurpations which the Bank-Whig-Abolitionists of that State were now attempting to perpetrate) had not been stigmatized by his colleague [Mr. BIDDLE] as a mob. He would not be doing his duty if he were silently to suffer the independent freemen of his native State to be thus slandered. He now repelled the gross charge with that indignation which it merits. He said he had been habituated to see in the Bank-Whig-Abolition newspapers, and to hear from their partisans, the whole vocabulary of billingsgate ransacked and exhausted, to find opprobrious epithets to apply to a people who dared to assert their rights against the domineering bank aristocracy. They have been pleased to style them mobs, swinish multitude, jacobins, disorganizers, destructives, dirty-shirts, locofocos, and every other name which this self-styled "decency party," in their fruitful imaginations, could invent to render the Democracy of Pennsylvania odious at home and abroad; taking care always to combine, as in the present instance, those epithets with a false statement of facts. He said he had just returned from Harrisburg, and saw no mob there, unless the military brought from Philadelphia, in direct violation of the constitution and laws of the State, by Governor Ritner and his Bank-Whig-Antimasonic-Abolition advisers, to shoot down the unarmed citizens of Pennsylvania, be that mob. He saw that mob, armed, and furnished with cartridges and ball and buckshot, to shoot down, he would reiterate, the unarmed citizens of his State, who were peaceably and constitutionally asserting their rights, and at the same time declaring their intention to support the Constitution and laws in their purity, and to prevent the usurpation of all the powers of the government by a band of unprincipled demagogues, who were attempting to set aside the will of the majority, fairly and clearly expressed, as they had previously attempted to corrupt and destroy the elective franchise at the recent general election.

Mr. P. said he saw at Harrisburg what is an anomaly in the United States, and he believed also in the despotic Governments of Europe, in modern days at least, the military furnished with cartridges, consisting of ball and three buckshot, to fire upon an unarmed people. He had brought one with him [holding it up to view] to exhibit to citizens of all parts of the Union; and let them anticipate what the people are to expect from the tender mercies of the Bank-Whig-Antimasons and Abolitionists, if unfortunately their party should get the Government into their hands. Yes, sir, (said he,) this is an earnest of what the people may expect if ever the country should be cursed by an Administration amalgamated of such materials. We will then see the armed soldiery throughout the Union, as they now are in Pennsylvania, furnished with the same kinds of munitions, to shoot down the people if they assemble peaceably to assert their rights. It was, in the estimation of this same Bank-Whig party, wickedly cruel, to use buckshot cartridges during the war of 1812 against the enemies of our country; but it now is perfectly humane and right to use them against our own citizens.

Sir, (said Mr. P.,) we hear complaints made that the United States officers are at Harrisburg, participating in what the gentleman and his partisans call a mob. I saw more than one person there who are officers under the United States Government, and who were brought there, not of their own volition, but by Governor Ritner and his partisans—dragged from their homes, their family, and their business, by his unlawful and arbitrary mandate, to shoot down their peaceable and unarmed fellow-citizens. The gentleman, in his haste to join in the cry against the officers of the United States Government, forgets to tell us that an officer of that Government, one of the "decency party," like himself, has furnished Governor Ritner and his people with fixed ammunition to slaughter the peaceable citizens of Pennsylvania. This part of the story he wishes kept behind the curtain, and he will, no doubt, applaud this violation of duty by that officer; but if a citizen officer under the United States Government happen to say that the people ought to rule, and are right, then he and his party join in the hue and cry, not only against the individual, but the Government also.

If people, peaceably assembled to prevent the usurpation of their rights and the subversion of the Constitution and their liberties by abandoned and unprincipled men, be a mob in the estimation of my colleague and of his party, then (said Mr. P.) I glory in being a Democrat and one of the people, whether they be called a mob, swinish multitude, Jacobin, Locofoco, or by whatever name they may be styled. They who are now arming themselves in Pennsylvania are ready to assert their rights against all encroachments, from whatever quarter they may be attacked, whether by foreign invaders or domestic traitors. As to the resolution before the House, he thought it ought to pass, that the Representatives of the people, and the people themselves, should know by what authority the arms and ammunition of the United States had been furnished to use against the peaceable citizens of his State. He had no doubt, however, that the gentleman [Mr. BIDDLE] and his party would much rather not let this outrage upon their brethren in Pennsylvania come before the public in an official and authentic way that cannot be denied.

Mr. NAYLOR said that he would vote for the resolution as it had been modified; but that, at the same time, he must express the hearty regret which he felt that this subject had been brought before the House in the form in which it now stood. He congratulated the country, however, if indeed it was a cause of congratulation, that the members of the Administration party were themselves beginning to move for inquiries. He knew what the object of the inquiry was so soon as the motion was submitted this morning. He knew that its object was political effect and political excitement. It was to furnish paragraphs to the Globe, and to sustain the officers of the Government of the United States in their efforts to usurp, through the medium of a mob, the government of the State of Pennsylvania.

I do not recollect (continued Mr. N.) that my honorable colleague who first addressed the House [Mr. BIDDLE] said anything about the persons engaged in this matter at Harrisburg. I do not recollect that he said anything to call forth the warlike ire of him who has just preceded me, [Mr. PETRIKIN.] But I say now, in my place, and I know exactly what I say, that they were for the most part a mob—men, some of them, going from the county of Philadelphia, having no interest in Harrisburg, led on by the officers of the General Government, for the purpose of declaring to the Legislature, assembled under the Constitution and the laws, that thus they should do, that “thus far they should go, and no further.”

But yet the gentleman [Mr. PETRIKIN] says that these men were peaceable citizens, and no mob. Let me state a fact. I have myself received letters since my arrival in this city, since the commencement of these disturbances, telling me—yes, sir, warning me—appealing to my fears, and telling me that if I dared to come here and attempt to take my seat—a seat to which I had been honored by a majority of nearly a thousand—the same men who had figured in these scenes at Harrisburg would through your Hall, would speak from your gallery, and drive you, sir, from that chair! I appeal to the people of the country—I ask every man in this House, be he a Democrat or what he may, to whatever party he may belong—I appeal to you as the descendants of the men of '76—I ask you, what think you of those who would make such threats? Are they peaceful, law-abiding citizens, or are they a mob? I ask you whether you intend to sustain these men in the work of wrong, of outrage and usurpation, which they have commenced?

Mr. Speaker, I know something of the controversy now going on at Harrisburg. I have, indeed, occasion to know something about it, for the immediate and primary cause of the whole was an attempt to cheat me out of my right to a seat on this floor, to which I was elected by a large majority of the freemen of the third congressional district of Pennsylvania—the people whom I represent. And, sir, if it be not out of place here, seeing that much has been said of an indefinite character by the gentleman who immediately preceded me, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] I will briefly relate, in order that the people may know, what are the causes of the unhappy controversy now going on at Harrisburg, if such an outrage can be called a controversy.

These subjects, Mr. Speaker, have all been alluded to. Deeply as I am interested in them, and deeply as I believe the honor of my State and of those whom I represent here to be involved in them, still I should have said nothing about them had they not been alluded to by the gentleman who last addressed the House, [Mr. PETRIKIN.]

Mr. PETRIKIN was understood to disclaim allusion to those things.

Mr. NAYLOR. Sir, the gentleman has talked of Whig mobs, of Bankites, of Biddleites, of Ritnerites, and all other kinds of ites that run so vividly through his imagination. For myself, I know no such distinction. I speak of my people as the American people, as my countrymen; when they are right I will sustain them without regard to party, and when they are wrong I must commiserate their errors, while at the same time I oppose them. The whole controversy arises, as I have said, from an unhallowed attempt, by fraud and violence, to take from me my seat on this floor.

The SPEAKER here interposed, and said that the question as to the right of any party to a seat in this House was not now under discussion, and that any debate directed to that point was out of order.

Mr. NAYLOR. I am not going to assert my right to a seat. This House, I know, has not the right to decide on that question. When I present myself here in the legislative hall of my country, as, God willing, I intend to do, in defiance of the empty threats and the loudly denounced terrors of these men, it will then be for the House to determine whether I shall take my seat, or whether they will hallow fraud, trample on the suffrages of the people I represent, by aiding another person in the usurpation of it, because he is a member of the Administration party! I say, then, that I am not about to show that I am entitled to a seat in the Twenty-Sixth Congress, except for the mere purpose of connecting this matter with the other, that the whole subject may be understood; for, without a knowledge of the one, you cannot understand the other. For this purpose, I want to go into the history of the transaction; and as the gentleman who has preceded me has gone so wide of the mark, and prated of blood and war, and the majesty of the assembled people at Harrisburg, I hope I may be permitted to follow him, so far at least as to reply to his statements, and disclose the whole truth! I ask for liberty to speak the truth! Not to advocate any party, but merely to state the truth! And will you deny me this reasonable boon?

The SPEAKER again interposed, and said that he did not understand that either of the gentleman's colleagues had entered upon the merits of this question, nor was it in order so to do. Anything relating to the resolution was in order.

Mr. NAYLOR. I understand the resolution perfectly. My colleague [Mr. PETRIKIN] has stated that these persons engaged at Harrisburg were not a mob, but that they were the assembled Democracy of Pennsylvania, peaceably obeying the requisitions of duty! I take issue with him on that point, and I wish to refer to the history of these transactions to show that the position he has assumed cannot be maintained.

The SPEAKER again interposed, and directed the attention of Mr. N. to the subject-matter of the resolution, and the facts connected therewith.

Mr. NAYLOR. Well, then, as I cannot state the truth, but can state the facts, even, I suppose, if they are true, I will mention as the first fact—a fact which is conceded on all sides—that I was elected a member of the Twenty-Sixth Congress. I state another fact, that certain persons in Philadelphia, assisted by officers of the General Government—one of them the man who has been most active in the disturbances at Harrisburg—resolved to cheat me out of the due returns for my seat. That is another fact, an incontrovertible fact, which no man who has the least regard for truth will deny.

I assert, as the third fact, that these men, and among them this officer of the General Government and the man who was my opponent—the man who, had he lived in the days which “tried men's souls,” “would have been a Tory”—went before the seventeen return judges and endeavored to get ten of them to make a partial return of the county of Philadelphia—such a return as would suit their own purposes.

The SPEAKER said all this was entirely out of order.

Mr. NAYLOR. The members of the Administration party move for inquiries. Oh, yes, they must occasionally have an inquiry; but, sir, they hate to hear the truth; they would trample upon it; they would stifle it. If I cannot speak the truth here, I can at least do so over my own name in the newspapers. Yes, sir; I can speak the truth there in defiance of them; and will do it! The whole story shall be told.

The SPEAKER again called to order.

Mr. NAYLOR. Well, sir, these ten return judges did do as they were commanded. They did make a return, such as had been required, of something upwards of two thirds of the votes of the county. The other judges would have made a correct return, and begged for hours, in the Hall of Independence, in Philadelphia, to be allowed to make a full and correct return for the whole county. But, sir—

The SPEAKER said the gentleman was out of order.

Mr. NAYLOR said he knew that truth sometimes was a very disagreeable thing. And then took his seat.

Mr. BIRDSALL was understood to say that, as he did not see that any useful object could be attained by protracting this debate, he would move the previous question.

Mr. NAYLOR claimed the floor. He had not yielded it, except in obedience to what he understood to be the injunction of the Speaker that he should take his seat.

The SPEAKER said he had understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania as having yielded the floor.

Mr. WISE moved that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have leave to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER said that that motion would take precedence of the demand for the previous question. The question, however, could only be put on leave to proceed in order, as no member could, by the rules, have leave to proceed out of order.

The yeas and nays were demanded on the motion for leave; which were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 150, nays 38.

So leave was granted to Mr. NAYLOR to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. NAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss to know what is in order. A moment ago it was in order, as I understood, for my colleague [Mr. PETRIKIN] to bandy harsh epithets; to call a portion of the Legislature of Pennsylvania Bankites, Antimasons, Ritnerites, and Federalists; to say that the men who had been carrying on their movements at Harrisburg were not a mob, but the Democracy of Pennsylvania assembled in their majesty, and peaceably and legally asserting their rights; and now I understand that it is not in order to disprove these allegations, maintain the side of the law and constitution, and to vindicate the officers of the law!

The SPEAKER said his decision had been that it was not in order to wander from the subject before the House, by entering into questions connected with the election returns in Pennsylvania.

Mr. NAYLOR. What I say is, then—and I speak with entire respect to the Chair—that it is impossible for me to controvert any of the positions assumed by my colleague, unless I am permitted to state facts, truth; and if it be out of order to state the truth, then I have nothing more to say!

The SPEAKER said that the only desire of the Chair was, to confine the debate within its proper limits, although sometimes remarks were made which it was not in the power of the Chair to arrest on the moment. It was possible, in the present case, that the true boundary had been exceeded before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] rose; but the Chair must look strictly to the subject-matter of the resolution. There was nothing on the face of it connected with the elections in Pennsylvania which could warrant any discussion in relation to them.

Mr. NAYLOR. I want to show from facts that are incontrovertible, not that one or the other set of candidates are entitled to their seats, but that such a state of things had been produced in Pennsylvania as to devolve it upon the Legislature, as an irresistible duty, to decide upon the matter between the claimants for seats. I want to show that the individuals who raised this disturbance were the very individuals who prevented a return of members to the Legislature from the county of Philadelphia, who made it the duty of the Legislature to investigate the whole matter; and that, after having imposed upon the Legislature this duty, which it could not throw off, which it must meet and perform, they go to Harrisburg, cry aloud for blood, and say to the Legislature: “You shall not investigate and decide the question; we will decide it for you, and, if you dare resist our decision, we will drive you from the capitol!” This, sir, is what I want to prove; and I can prove it. I do not want to maintain the right of either set of candidates to their seats.

Mr. BEATTY rose to a point of order; and,

Mr. NAYLOR having requested Mr. B. to reduce his point of order to writing;

The SPEAKER said he did not perceive that the immediate remarks of the gentleman were out of order.

Mr. NAYLOR. Then, Mr. Speaker, I must return to the place where I was when I was originally arrested. I must state facts in order to show the justice of my conclusions. I do not desire to waste the time of this House, nor to trespass upon its rules.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman again follows the course of remark which he intimates his intention to do, the Chair must do its duty.

Mr. NAYLOR. In the first place, then, I state that there were no legal returns from the county of Philadelphia to the Legislature of Pennsylvania; because, among others, some of the individuals who raised the disturbances at Harrisburg have prevented those returns; and, that being the case, the Legislature was obliged, by the constitution and the laws, to decide between the two sets of claimants.

Then I state, as another fact, (for I will not enter into detail,) that these men, and others who prevented the returns and imposed upon the Legislature the necessity of deciding the matter, proceeded to Harrisburg for the purpose of declaring that the Legislature should not decide this matter; that they drove the Speaker from the chair, called aloud for the blood of individual members by name, and threatened the Governor of Pennsylvania, who has been stigmatized here (for, I suppose that the gentleman who made use of the term intended it as a stigma) as being an Antimason and a Federalist. There was no government. For the space of nearly a week the Executive of Pennsylvania could not get to the Executive Chamber. The members of the Legislature could not get to their seats; the doors were closed against them, and only the favored few, whom these men thought proper to admit, were admitted. Under these circumstances, I suppose, for I know nothing about it, the Executive of Pennsylvania called on the Executive of the United States to interfere; and for doing this, he has been stigmatized in the ranting tirade to which we have listened, from my colleague, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] who, I blush to own it, has openly encouraged this resistance to law, and publicly gloried in the outrages which I feel have so deeply disgraced Pennsylvania.

Now, I ask if the Governor of Pennsylvania could not call to his aid the militia of the State, when threatened by a revolutionary movement on the part of a mob, when the sheriff of the county and some of the civil authorities had united with that mob, to arrest the Governor in the execution of the laws and in the performance of his functions, what would have been the situation of Pennsylvania? She would have been without a government and without officers, at least for all the legitimate purposes for which offices are created. And if these men were, in truth, the people of Pennsylvania, acting in conformity with the Constitution and laws, as my colleague [Mr. PETRIKIN] contends, where is the law, where is the article of the Constitution which justifies their proceedings? Who was to hold the reins of the government of Pennsylvania? Who was to sit in the courts? Who was to summon the jurors? Who was to make arrests? Who was to perform the ten thousand duties which were to be performed in that county and throughout the State of Pennsylvania, when these individuals rushed in and possessed themselves of all the authority? Which one of them was to be chief? How were their commands to be issued to the people of Pennsylvania? and who were to execute their commands? Can these questions be answered by those who maintain that the people in their majesty were constitutionally and legally there exercising their authorities? The majesty of the Democracy of Pennsylvania! says the gentleman. To what a puny body has the gentleman reduced the great Democracy of Pennsylvania, (of which I am one,) when he has thus consented to enage them all in the narrow confines of the legislative chambers of the capitol of the State!

The Governor of Pennsylvania may probably have acted indiscreetly (I do not assert that he has) in calling upon the General Government for aid, if he has done so. The Speaker of the Senate may have acted indiscreetly in retiring before the mob. The members of the Legislature may have done wrong in vacating their seats and retreating before the storm of popular rage and popular fury. For myself, I say, if I had been a member, I would have stood at my post, fearless of all consequences, and will now tell those who have thus threatened me, that my seat in this Hall shall be maintained, in defiance of all their stormy terrors!

Mr. WHITTLESEY called Mr. NAYLOR to order; and was remarking on the amount of business which lay before the House, and the number of petitions which other gentlemen had to present, when he was himself called to order by many voices.

Mr. NAYLOR. It is not I who have consumed the time of the House. I am ready and anxious to apply myself to the business which lies before it. I am ever ready to work. Who introduced this resolution? Did I? Was it I who made the motion to suspend the rules for its introduction? And did I demand the yeas and nays? The inquiry came from an extraordinary part of the House. We had an inquiry moved the other day from a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and I appeal to that gentleman to say whether he had found the Administration party willing to join him in sustaining his inquiry? No, sir; that was an inquiry which the country demanded, and which would expose to the light of day the doings of those in high places connected with the General Government. That inquiry was smothered!

Mr. HOPKINS here called Mr. NAYLOR to order.

Mr. NAYLOR. I was interrupted and appealed to by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] who sustained his appeal by an argument addressed to me. All this was in order and proper, I suppose. But the moment I attempt to make a reply to that appeal, the moment my lips are open to vindicate myself, I am out of order. What kind of justice is this?

The SPEAKER said it was not in order. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the question before the House.

Mr. NAYLOR. I will say no more. I should have liked, for the sake of the country, to have told the truth and the whole truth of this disgraceful disturbance! In doing which, I would have favored no party. I would have told the naked truth! But, sir, you would not suffer me. You will have inquiry sometimes—yes, you will have inquiry—but, then, the inquiry must be partial, all on one side! You will ask for information—but you want information all in your favor. I asked to tell the whole story, and I was gagged. This House, or at least a portion of it “hates the light because its deeds are evil.”

Here Mr. NAYLOR was loudly called to order.

Mr. BRONSON moved the previous question; but the House refused to second the motion.

Mr. PETRIKIN again rose, not he said, to make a speech, but to explain and correct some things which his colleague [Mr. NAYLOR] had asserted as having been stated by him when first he addressed the House. Mr. P. said it was not true that he had used the term “Biddleites,” nor had he connected the name of Mr. Nicholas Biddle with this matter, in any way, directly or indirectly. He also said that it was not true, that he used any abusive language towards the Governor of Pennsylvania, as an individual, nor of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. Personally, he had nothing to do with the former, and for the latter, as a body, he had the highest respect. His intention was to speak of Governor Ritner only in connection with his party, and to reprobate the attempt made by him and his partisans to usurp the Government of Pennsylvania, and to expose their acts of usurpation and tyranny. If he was understood by any to have used language, other than what he now stated he did, he disclaimed it, as he did all intention of personality towards the Governor in his individual capacity.

Mr. P. observed that he felt inclined to take some notice of his colleague's [Mr. NAYLOR's] egotistical remarks, and boasting of the deeds of his ancestors, but he supposed this course would be a breach of order, and he would decline.

Mr. FRY said that, after the indulgence given by the House, with a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the resolutions now pending, he did not feel himself authorized to consume any of the time of the House in prolonging the discussion; he would, however, state to his respected colleague [Mr. BIDDLE] that he did introduce these resolutions, not for political effect, as he had intimated, but for purposes which he would now, as he felt in duty bound, state to the House.

Mr. F. said a state of affairs now existed in Pennsylvania, which he deeply regretted. For several days past various rumors had been in circulation; among the rest, it was rumored that the Governor of Pennsylvania had made a call upon the President of the United States for an armed force to march to Pennsylvania; another rumor has been, that munitions of war, of some kind, had been given, by an officer under the United States Government, to General Patterson's brigade. Whether these rumors be true or not, he did not know; but he considered it a matter vitally important to the people of Pennsylvania, that, whatever may be the truth of these rumors, they should be informed of it; they have a right to know it, and it was in behalf of the people of Pennsylvania that he sought the information, and not for himself—not for political effect. He understood from his colleague that there would be no opposition to this resolution from any quarter. He should, therefore, take his seat and await the speedy action of the House upon the matter.

Mr. McKENNA said he had voted against the suspension of the rules for the introduction of the resolution of his colleague, because he could see no good or beneficial purposes to be answered by the call, and because he feared that the discussion here would be calculated to arouse feelings that, as a Pennsylvanian, and as a lover of peace and good order, he did not wish to see indulged. He regretted that the resolution had been offered. Scenes which were outrageous and disgraceful had, he blushed to say, been enacted in the capitol of his state; outrages which had inflicted a stain deep and indelible upon the character of a community who had hitherto been distinguished for their love of peace, of order, and of law. He wished that the recollection of the violence and outbreaks of a reckless and infuriated mob, which had set all law at defiance, and had invaded the sanctity of the Senate chamber, and, by their threats of violence and blood, had driven from their seats the representatives of the people, should not be kept alive by anything said or done here. He thought that the resolution of his colleague, couched in the language in which it was, (whatever might be his intention in moving it,) was calculated to fan the flame which he had hoped was nearly extinguished, and to keep up that spirit which had already too much disgraced Pennsylvania as a State. He hoped that the facts connected with those revolutionary and insurrectional movements which have for some time been of absorbing interest, and have directed the anxious eyes of the people of the whole country to the first appalling attempt to overawe the Legislature of a State in the discharge of their legitimate and constitutional duties, might be buried in oblivion. They reflected no credit upon the party with which his colleague who offered the resolution was associated, and he was willing to forget, as soon as possible, the lawless violence which had been countenanced, encouraged, and promoted by many in that party—in which some of the officers of the General Government had participated, and which, if it had not been for the discreet, unbending, and persevering firmness of the Executive of the State, would have inflicted a blow upon the permanency of our republican institutions which would have been felt from Maine to Georgia. Happily for the perpetuity of those institutions, although the threats of a ruthless band of ruffians had, for a time, interrupted the regular course of legislation in the Senate chamber, and of business in the executive offices, the prudent and firm exercise of the power invested in him by the constitution and law had put to flight those disturbances of the peace, and thus the fatal blow had been warded off.

He said he could not hear the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] which were delivered in so low a tone as to be almost inaudible from his seat; but if they were conceived in that same spirit which actuated a lawless and infuriated mob to trample under foot the law and the Constitution, (and, judging from his gesticulation, and the little he could gather as it grated upon his ear, he believed those remarks to have that tendency,) he did not regret that they had been lost. The promulgation of such principles, and the indulgence of such feelings, were calculated neither to benefit or enlighten the House, nor to do good to the country. He understood him to cast his censure upon the Governor for calling to his aid, in the support of the laws, the militia of the Commonwealth, and reflected upon him for doing what was his duty—his imperious duty.

Mr. McK. said he was not going into an examination of the facts or the law relative to the titles to the contested seats in the Senate of Pennsylvania. The rules of the House, as well as his own inclination, forbade his entering into that inquiry. It was enough for him to know, and it was enough for the Governor of the State to know, that the law had been set at defiance—that the sanctity of the Senate chamber had been invaded, the lives of its members threatened, and that revolution had commenced. Under such circumstances, he would have been derelict in duty, if he had not put into requisition all the power vested in him by the Constitution to restore peace and order and safety. Thanks for his firmness and fearlessness! he has acted energetically and prudently, and Mr. McK. hoped the crisis was past, and that the difficulties which had arisen might be peaceably and constitutionally settled. He said he would vote for the resolutions, although he had been opposed to the introduction of the exciting topic into this Hall.

Mr. BEATTY regretted as much as any gentleman there the excited feeling that had been got up in that House; but he appealed to them all to say whence it had arisen. How calmly and coolly these gentlemen can call the assembled people of Pennsylvania a mob! But to denounce the Democracy of the country as a mob, when, perchance, the people were against it, was but another evidence of their vindictive feeling against them. The resolution was a plain and substantive proposition, having for its object merely to get at the truth; and why, then, all this severity of denunciation? Why so much feeling about it, as though the truth should be stifled?

But Mr. B. insisted that the time had never existed in Pennsylvania which would justify the Governor in calling out the troops to his aid. So much for the gentleman's veracity! He presumed the state of excited feeling under which he spoke made him forget the truth. But it seemed the time was come when the truth could not be told to gentlemen who were so very sensitive under it.

Mr. BIDDLE said that as the decision made excluded facts, but seemed to tolerate assertions, he was not inclined to pursue the discussion on what he felt must be unequal terms. He had not impeached the motives of his colleague, [Mr. FAY,] but he had been struck at what seemed a suspicious black privateer streak about the resolution, and he had pointed to it accordingly in the way of caution. It seems that the mob which broke up legislative proceedings at Harrisburg is the Democracy. It might, perhaps, be asked, as the mob had disappeared, what had become of the Democracy, in the view of gentlemen who insisted on the identity? But, sir, when shall we have an end of this miserable abuse of the word Democracy? Let gentlemen determine dates and principles. If by Democracy be meant a fixed and deep conviction of the capacity of the people for self-government, he would yield to no one in a claim to the title. At home and abroad he had learned that, with all its turmoil and agitation, our form of Government best ministers to the great purpose for which all government is instituted. If dates are to control, he would like to compare notes with a distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, who had become a newspaper writer on this subject. He would take the late war with Great Britain as a starting point.

Mr. B. concluded by saying he would vote for the resolution, however he might deprecate the inflammatory air which had needlessly been given to it.

Mr. BEATTY regretted exceedingly that his colleague had worked himself into such a passion about this matter. Now, Mr. B. would not say a word to offend any one, but if gentlemen in that House combined their efforts to deter him from speaking what he knew was true, they would find themselves mistaken in their efforts. He was not the man, either in this House or out of it, to retract anything which he had said. Now, he would unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly assert that there was no mob in Harrisburg at all. It was a bugbear existing only in the imagination of certain gentlemen, and falsely asseverated by certain corrupt individuals, who wished to persuade the people of Pennsylvania that there was a mob at Harrisburg, in order to cover over and conceal the iniquities of an Administration that has been misruling that State for the last three years. These men want the people to believe there is a mob, so that they might escape in the mist. But it was the habit of those silk-stocking gentry to call the Democracy of the country a mob, though he could tell them they knew nothing about mobs in the part of the country he came from. He denied the existence of a mob at Harrisburg. It was an assemblage of many of the most respectable and intelligent people of Pennsylvania, merely looking on, as they had a perfect right to do, at the proceedings of their Legislature; and because a set of cowardly and treacherous knaves are afraid to meet the people face to face, and escaped through back windows, pursued only by their own guilty consciences, they attempt to raise a great hue and cry that a mob is at their heels. And so it is here. When we offer a resolution merely asking for information, the propriety of procuring which no one dare question, we are then told that our motive is to excite the people and add fuel to a flame enkindled and kept alive by themselves!

The resolution was then agreed to, with but few dissenting voices.

PETITIONS, ETC.

There being no other business before the Chair, Petitions and memorials were then presented by Messrs. PARMENTER, BRIGGS, GRENELL, and REED, of Massachusetts.

[Mr. PARMENTER presented the petition of Henry Hatch, for indemnity on account of French spoiliations prior to 1800; of Mary Page, for revolutionary pension; of Sylvanus Wood, for increase of pension; of Levi Brigham and 24 others, of Dunstable, Massachusetts, for the rejection of proposals for the admission into the Union of States whose constitution may tolerate slavery; of M. H. P. Dudley and 82 other women, of Chelmsford, Massachusetts; of Sally Woods and 46 other women, of Dunstable, Massachusetts; and Zenas Brown and 15 others, citizens of Shirley, Massachusetts, for the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.]

Mr. GRENELL presented a petition from Northfield, Massachusetts, for opening negotiations and international intercourse with Hayti; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WISE moved a reconsideration of that reference.

Mr. HOWARD thought the gentleman had better let it go to the committee, for these petitions had come in every year.

Mr. WISE could not; for he regarded it as a subject of wholesale amalgamation, incorporating a black Republic with a white one.

Mr. GRENELL denied that it was either the one or the other.

The petition, however, giving rise to debate, was ordered to lie over.

Mr. REED presented a similar petition from Nantucket.

Mr. WISE objected to its reception.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. A. then proceeded to address the House at length, in support of the right of petition, and especially in reference to this particular question, showing the expediency of an early recognition of the Republic of Hayti.

Mr. WISE insisted that these petitions were part and parcel of abolition; and he read the petition at length, which asked, also, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the non-admission of any new slave State, &c.

Before the question was taken,

On motion of Mr. GRENELL, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 18, 1838.

The PRESIDENT submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in regard to the operations of that office during the year 1837, and part of 1838; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of Captain Robert White, an officer in the army of the Revolution, for his commutation pay; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of Andrew Logan, of Davenport, Iowa, for two quarter sections of land, to be used in the culture of silk; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. B. said that he had rather a strange petition to present to the Senate; but it came from a very respectable and scientific man; and, however strange it might appear, it was vouched for by several of the most respectable literary gentlemen of the city of Philadelphia. The petitioner was Mr. James P. Espy, so deservedly celebrated for his knowledge of meteorology, who says that he has discovered the means of making it rain in a tract of country at a period when there would be no rain without the use of his process. Mr. Espy proposed to make the experiment at his own expense; and he proposed that Congress should pass an act engaging to reward him with a certain sum if he succeeded in making it rain in a tract of country ten miles square; a still higher sum if he produced rain in a tract of country one thousand square miles; a still higher sum if he produced rain in a tract of five thousand square miles; and, lastly, to give him a still greater compensation if he should cause the Ohio river to be navigable all summer from Pittsburg to the Mississippi.

Mr. B. observed that he was perfectly acquainted with Mr. Espy, and knew him to be a very respectable man. He had no faith himself that the gentleman possessed the power he claimed; but it was true that there were several things in nature that philosophy had never yet dreamed of. Mr. B. then moved to refer the petition to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BENTON observed that the Senator from Pennsylvania, who introduced the petition, could not make the motion which he would make—that gentleman had felt himself bound to treat this petition seriously, and move for its reference to a committee. He would move that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers, for reasons too obvious to require notice.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he would rather that the course proposed by the Senator from Missouri should not be taken with the petition. He scarcely knew himself what to say about it; but he knew Mr. Espy to be a highly respectable and learned man, and knew that in the science of meteorology there was scarcely a man in the United States his superior. He hardly believed it to be in Mr. Espy's power to make it rain, though there were some six or seven of the most respectable literary gentlemen of the city of Philadelphia who expressed the opinion that he proceeded on highly philosophical principles. He hoped the Senator from Missouri would permit the petition to take the usual course, and go to a committee; and if that motion did not prevail, that it would, at least, be suffered to lie on the table.

Mr. CRITTENDEN would vote against the proposition of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] for the purpose of recording his vote in favor of that of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] He doubted very much, whether, even if this thing was possible, it would be good policy to encourage the measure. He would be very sorry that any individual should have the power that this gentleman professes to have, more especially from the announcement that he was about to take the Ohio river under his especial protection. Why, sir, he might enshroud us in continual clouds, and, indeed, falsify the promise that the earth should be no more submerged. And if he possesses the power of causing rain, he may also possess the power of withholding it, and, in his pleasure, instead of giving us a navigable river, may present us with rocks and shoals and sandbars. He thought that this would be too dangerous a power to intrust to any individual, unless we had a counteracting power, capable of prompt application—without we had some very summary process of manufacturing sunshine. This, indeed, had been attempted by some French philosopher, but he thought with no great success. He was also opposed to this scheme on another account—it had too much the appearance of a sub-Treasury about it; a hoarding up of clouds and vapors to be dispensed at will by an individual. He thought the proper course in relation to it was that indicated by the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. NILES remarked that he agreed in many things with his worthy friend who had just taken his seat, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] He thought this subject was not fitted for the consideration of Congress; and he must be permitted to say that the Senate would be badly employed in discussing whether this gentleman possessed the power of creating rain, or of causing the rise and swell of rivers. If this gentleman could create rain, he could also prevent it; and he might dry up the Ohio river, and throw all the steamboats on the sand. If, however, this matter was to be referred, he would prefer sending it to the Committee on Finance. It was somewhat similar to paper money, a sort of sublimated bubble; and, according to the idea he entertained of a bubble, it was the same thing as the enlargement of this wonderful paper system, promising great things, magnifying credit, blowing it up, and making magnificent fortunes out of nothing, till, in the end, it is all blown away by the first breath of reality that touches it.

The question was then taken; and the motion to refer the petition was lost.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved to lay it on the table; which motion was carried.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, it was Ordered, That the papers of John Kennedy, on the files of the last session, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. FULTON, it was Ordered, That the papers of James Erwin, on the files of the last session, be again referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of the president and directors of the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company, for the refunding of certain duties on railroad iron, reported a bill for that purpose; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Zephaniah Spigot and James De Kraft; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill making appropriations, in part, in support of Government for the year 1838-39, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. stated that, as this bill was one of some importance, and as a speedy action was somewhat necessary, he would move to consider it at once.

The bill was accordingly taken up in Committee of the Whole, when

Mr. WALL moved to amend it by inserting at the bottom of the bill, "and for the Revolutionary pensions, under the act of the 7th July, 1838, the sum of $250,000."

Mr. BENTON rose to object to the insertion of an appropriation for an object which ought to be provided for in a bill of its own, in one of the ordinary appropriation bills for carrying on the operations of the Government. He objected to this heavy appropriation being slipped through in this manner, without notice, and almost without the knowledge of the Senate. Here was an appropriation of between two and three hundred thousand dollars for an object that had crept into the legislation of Congress almost without the notice of any one there, and by the time the estimates on which it was founded were carried through, the amount would swell up to two or three millions. It was worth while for Senators to look back and observe how and in what manner this pension system had grown up to its present enormous magnitude. In looking at the pension laws, it would be found that there were forty-one thousand souls receiving money from the Treasury for which they were rendering no service whatever. The whole was given under the assumption that an equivalent in personal services had been rendered for it during the revolutionary war, during the late war with Great Britain, or in some of the Indian wars; and if it was only to those who received their pensions as survivors of the Revolution, or who had served meritoriously in any of our wars, he would be the last man who would object to giving them. But he apprehended the pension system had extended itself far beyond these cases. He did not know if we had yet taken the second step of making pensions hereditary, as it was in Europe, by giving them to the children of those who were supposed to be entitled to them; but he recollected that, at the last session, an appeal was made to them to give pensions to European castes of hereditary descent; and in another case an application was made by an individual of seventy years of age, who claimed to be the orphan of a revolutionary soldier. He did not know if they had yet taken the second step in the pension system, by making pensions hereditary; but it was enough for his present purpose to say that the pension list had swelled up to the enormous amount of forty-one thousand souls, and he undertook to say that there was not a country on the face of the globe who had such a number of persons, in proportion to her population and resources, living on the labor of others, without rendering any kind of service whatever, but under the assumption that they had rendered service in former times. The pension list under Washington's administration amounted to only $200,000; and, even after the Indian wars of Wayne and St. Clair, it had only increased to about three hundred thousand dollars. After the late war with Great Britain, a proposition was made to provide for those survivors of the Revolution who needed the aid of their country. That proposition was not objected to, and $200,000 was deemed amply sufficient for that purpose. It was urged, on the passage of the law thus brought forward, that the amount necessary to provide for these veterans of the Revolution would only be required for a few years, and that that amount would diminish yearly.

How mistaken had all these assumptions proved! They had seen the appropriations swell up to four or five millions, instead of two or three hundred thousand; and the list, instead of diminishing, as predicted, swelled up to an army of over forty thousand. In addition to all this, by some turn of phraseology given to the law of the last session, and which no one heeded at the time, a gap was made requiring two or three millions more to stop. If he stood alone, and in such a position, he was willing to stand alone; he would vote against this appropriation coming into this bill, which was for carrying on the operations of the Government. Yes, sir, (said Mr. B.) forty-one thousand persons, and four or five millions—as much as the whole annual expense of the Federal Government under the administration of General Washington—was now required to pension them, while this Administration and its friends were daily stigmatized with the charge of extravagance. Who could have thought, when some seemingly trifling verbal alteration was made in the act of the last session that we should now have the estimates swelled up some two or three millions? In England, it was said that a pensioner never dies; and it is said so because the pension is hereditary, and goes to the descendants for one life, two lives, or three lives, as the case may be. Sir, it seems that with us they not only never die, but they increase and multiply. He heard that when the estimate of $200,000 was made as the amount sufficient to provide for the survivors of the Revolution, the complaint was made of the small sum that was to be expended on such interesting objects, and that a member of the other House in the enthusiasm of his gratitude, exclaimed, "Soldiers of the Revolution, may you live forever!" On that occasion, some gentleman proposed, as a compromise, that they should live for nine hundred and ninety-nine years. Now, it seemed that this compromise had been carried into effect. According to the estimates made by those persons who calculate the insurances on lives, the amount of the military population fifty years ago, which had furnished forty-one thousand survivors, must have been millions. For this number of survivors General Washington must have had an army equal to that of Xerxes when he crossed the Hellespont.

Sir, it is time for us to stop and consider what we are about. So far as there are real survivors of the Revolution, who rendered service to their country and need its aid, he would cheerfully contribute for their support; but to undertake to make him believe that such a pension list was founded on anything more than an imposition on the sensibilities of the nation, was an undertaking worthy only of the graduates of the college of Laputa.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked, that as a friend to the object which the Senator from New Jersey had in view, he felt constrained to make an appeal to him to withdraw his amendment to the appropriation bill which had passed the House of Representatives, and which had been reported to the Senate this morning from the Committee on Finance. It was necessary that this bill should pass, and pass without delay. He had no doubt that, at this moment, there were no means now provided by law to meet the drafts of the two Houses of Congress. The amendment proposed would tend to embarrass and delay the passage of this bill; and the honorable Senator from New Jersey must be sensible that it was usual to make provision for the payment of the pensioners and annuitants, under the various acts of Congress, by a separate and independent bill for that specific purpose.

It had not been customary heretofore to mingle the appropriations for the payment of pensioners with appropriations for any other object. He was prepared to give his vote for carrying into full effect the act of July last. But if the merits of that bill were at this late period to be debated on a proposition to make the necessary appropriations for executing that act, he should much prefer to discuss the subject, when it should arise under a bill independent of all other appropriations. He hoped, therefore, that his honorable friend from New Jersey would not urge his proposition at this time. Let this bill pass unembarrassed by any other appropriations, and he entertained no doubt that shortly a bill would be brought forward for the express and avowed purpose of making the necessary appropriations for the payment of pensioners, under the various acts of Congress. Then would be the fit time to test the merit of the bill of the last session. Then would be the time to see if a majority of the Senate would vote to withhold the appropriations, and thus virtually defeat that measure, which is now one among the public statutes of this Government. When such an opportunity presented, he should endeavor to show to the Senate that these pension laws were not obnoxious to the objections which had been made against them. He hoped then to be able to satisfy the Senator from Missouri that even the act of the last session, which received his most undissembled approbation, ought now to be carried into full effect, and that the appropriations for that purpose should not be withheld. But he was sure that enough had already transpired to satisfy his honorable friend from New Jersey that this is not the fit time, nor is this the proper occasion to bring before the Senate, thus incidentally, the merits of the act of the last session. He hoped that the Senator would withdraw his proposed amendment, and permit the bill to pass without objection; but should the Senator decline so to do, he should certainly not only vote for his amendment, but he would endeavor to reply to some of the suggestions of the honorable Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WALL was not disposed to occupy the time of the Senate in reply to the honorable Senator from Missouri. How he has fallen into such an error in relation to a law upon our statute-book, and embracing that occasion to denounce the pension system, he could not imagine. This law was passed at the last session, but we made no appropriation to meet it; we come back here, and the first thing we do is to take care of ourselves. We cannot retrace our steps in this matter. The law is already passed; one thousand applicants have already received their certificates; and we owe it to ourselves, to our country, to the pensioners themselves, to pass this amendment as an act of sheer justice. We have passed the law, and justice requires that we should make appropriations to meet it.

Mr. DAVIS expressed his gratification at the refusal of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WALL] to withdraw the amendment, and said that, if he had done so, he would have renewed it himself. Those who had received certificates under the act of the last session were entitled to their pensions, and could not be deprived of them; and as the time when these certificates would be due was drawing near, he thought it very proper that provision should be made for them in this bill.

Mr. D. made a few remarks defending the pension system generally, and the act of the last session in particular, and denied that our pension list was at all assimilated to that of Great Britain, where persons were pensioned who had rendered no service to their country. He asked if those who fought and bled through the war of the Revolution were to be compared with those who were put in the Red Book of Great Britain without any merit of their own; and were their wounds to be no more regarded than the hereditary claims of the British pensioner?

Mr. D., after commenting on the merits and services of the soldiers of the Revolution, and referring to the depreciated funds in which they were paid, asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment; which were accordingly ordered.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that when he was up before, he stated that, if his honorable friend from New Jersey should not accede to his request, he should vote for the amendment proposed; and he also stated that he was much in favor of the bill reported at the last session: from the Committee on Pensions, and which has become the law of the land. He very fully concurred in the views of the Senator from Massachusetts, in relation to this whole subject. He never had regarded, and he never could regard, the present pension system, as it existed under our Government, and in pursuance of the various acts of Congress, as mere gratuities. If he had viewed this subject in that light, it never could have received his support. He had had some connection with the act of June 7, 1832. He was, at the time of its passage, a member of the other House, and at the head of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions; and sure he was that when the bill was reported from that committee, and while it was under the consideration of the other House, it was at no time treated or considered as a mere act of generosity, as a mere donation on the part of the Government. It was, in his opinion, but an imperfect discharge of a most just, but long neglected debt, to a small remnant of the survivors of the Revolution; a debt contracted when the Government could not pay; but which was then uncanceled, and due to those men who had achieved the independence of their country. It was for such a class of our citizens—men who had faithfully served, in that day of danger and discouragement, for a period not less than six months, in the war of the Revolution—that the act of July, 1832, provided. Can it be said with even the shadow of truth, that these men had been bona fide paid by this Government for the services which they had thus performed for their country? If so, how, and in what way was this debt of the Revolution discharged? Certainly it will not, at this time, in this period of our prosperity, be said that the final settlement certificates, a paper which when given could not have been converted into specie at a less sacrifice than three fourths of its nominal value, was a fair, honest, and just liquidation of these claims for revolutionary service. He never had, and he never could, view this matter in this light. He had seen too many of those men who had fought the battles of the Revolution. He had heard too often their stories of suffering and distress, which they were forced to endure by reason of the miserable, depreciated, and almost worthless currency in which they were paid for their services in the Revolution; and when he, as the organ of the Committee on Pensions of the other House, recommended the passage of the act of June, 1832, it was urged and sustained throughout as a measure providing for the partial payment for revolutionary services.

The act of June, 1832, was in its terms but an addition to the act of May 1, 1828. It must be fresh in the recollection of Senators now present upon what principle that act was sustained. Was it then considered as a gratuity to that class of our citizens who had faithfully served their country to the close of the Revolution? It provided for them, and it provided only for them. The Continental Congress had, by resolution after resolution, made liberal provision to those who should continue in the service to the close of the Revolution. First, half pay for life, and that commuted for five years' full pay. The non-fulfillment of these resolutions, the manner in which the services of these men had been requited by their Government, induced the passage of the act of May, 1828. All admitted that it was a most just measure of legislation; and the act of June, 1832, was but an extension of the benefits of the act of May, 1828. It granted pensions to those, whether militia, State, or Continental, according to the period of their service, withholding pensions from those who had rendered a less period of service than six months. This was the general provision of the act of June, 1832. It was founded on revolutionary service, and on that alone; it was intended to make some satisfaction for that service, and for that alone. It may be well to just trace the history of our pension system, and see how the several acts granting these annuities were passed. The act of March, 1818—the first general pension act—seems to find favor here; and the several acts granting pensions for disabilities incurred during the Revolution, and during the last war, seem also most justly to find favor here. Will any Senator say that the act of March, 1818, was supported on the ground of mere gratuity? that it was passed on any such ground? No. It was supported, and it was passed, on the ground of service. It is perfectly true that the act of March, 1818, was not only extremely limited in its provisions—including those, and those only, who were attached to the continental line—but it was also extremely humiliating in its requisitions. Its benefits were intended to be extended only to those who were either tenants of the poorhouse, or supported by private charity. But, nevertheless, that bill was also founded on service alone; and, under its provisions, a much larger number than was ever anticipated was added to the pension roll.

This led to the passage of the act of 1820, which, for a time, suspended the pensions which had been granted under the act of March, 1818, and which required that schedules of property should be furnished, that the Department might judge whether the applicants were in such indigent circumstances as to need relief from the country. It was done, and the consequence was that nearly one half of the number who had been placed on the pension list under the act of March, 1818, were never reinstated. It must be recollected, that more than twenty thousand had, at one time, been admitted under that act; and when the list of pensioners under the act of June, 1832, is compared with the list under the act of March, 1818, it should be borne in mind that probably not less than one third of those now pensioners under the act of June, 1832, were once included in the list of pensioners under the act of March, 1818. The act of June, 1832, includes those who served in the militia and as State troops, as well as those who served in the Continental line for six months and upwards; granting pensions, in proportion to the period of service, equal to one half the original pay; not in any case to grant a pension for a period of more than two years' service; while the act of March, 1818, grants a pension of ninety-six dollars a year for any period of service not less than nine months. It is not, therefore, difficult to account for the difference in the number of pensioners under these different acts. He was perfectly aware that there were not less than twenty-five thousand on the list under the act of June, 1832, while there were less than ten thousand under the act of March, 1818; but it should also be remembered that by the provisions of the acts of Congress, invalid pensioners, for disabilities incurred during the war of the Revolution, are entitled also to all the benefits of the act of June, 1832. He, therefore, found no difficulty in accounting for the difference in the number of pensioners under the act of March, 1818, and the number under the act of June, 1832.

After these acts had been passed, Congress, by a law of 1836, extended all the benefits of the act of June, 1832, to the widows of those soldiers of the Revolution whose husbands had died before the passage of the act, and where the marriage took place before the expiration of the last period of their husbands' service. This act, as far as it went, he verily believed met with general approbation through the country. It was regarded as an act of justice, as well as humanity; but it was extremely difficult to understand the reason why those widows whose marriage took place before the expiration of their husbands' service should be pensioned, and those widows whose marriage took place immediately after the close of the revolutionary struggle should be excluded. There seemed to be no good reason for the distinction; it was invidious in its character; it was unjust in its effect; and memorial after memorial, resolution after resolution, were introduced with a view to do away with this distinction; and the Committee on Pensions, at the last session, responding to these calls, introduced the bill which is now under consideration. It was reported, had its several readings here, was passed; had its several readings in the other House, and was passed; and during its progress not one word was heard in either branch in opposition to the measure. And what is now proposed? That the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect should be withheld, because the act could not have been well considered. Congress failed to do its duty at the last session in not making the requisite appropriation; and he presumed that Senators supposed that this act, with the acts of May, 1828, June, 1832, and June, 1836, contained a clause making the necessary appropriations to carry it into effect. He presumed that a majority in this or the other House could not be found in favor of repealing this act; and it seemed to him passing strange that, while the act exists in the statute-book, there should be a single Senator who would vote to withhold the appropriation, and thus defeat the practical operation of a measure which has been sanctioned by the legislative power of the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN regarded the whole system of pensions in a light far different from that in which it was viewed by the Senators from Massachusetts and New Hampshire. With the exception of the first pension act, he looked upon it as little more than a system of distributing the public revenue. It grew out of the protective system, and was founded on no principle of justice or patriotism, for it took all who served in the Revolution, and put those who only turned out on a tour of three months on the same footing as those who had fought the battles of the whole war. He understood this system from beginning to end, and it was commenced as a means of disbursing the public revenue which had been iniquitously collected. To tell him that all those now on the pension list deserved the bounty of the Government, was to impose on him a humbug too gross to be listened to. Pension laws were passed, and there were swarms of undertakers here and in the States who hunted up documents and brought forward every description of claims, just or unjust, and passed them on the Department without a possibility of their guarding against the grossest fraud in a number of cases. It was impossible for Congress to pass pension laws without having a plenty to support them. To show how the system operated, he would mention one fact. Before Congress undertook the business of pensioning the soldiers of the Revolution, Massachusetts and South Carolina each had pension laws of their own. The pension list of South Carolina amounted to the sum of $14,000 annually, while that of Massachusetts amounted to only $1,000. Well, Congress took these pensions in hand, and after the expiration of several years the pensioners of Massachusetts are swelled up to $300,000 per annum, while those of South Carolina receive only $10,000. Now this fact alone would show that the pension system did not originate in patriotism, because it would not be denied that the patriotism of the one State was as great as that of the other. It was time that this thing was stopped, or they would have to run the country in debt to provide for it. He knew very well that as long as there was money in the Treasury it would be got at; but he thanked Providence that the time had come round when they must stop short in their career of extravagance. We had now no surplus; and the compromise bill was bringing down the revenue, while there seemed to be a general disinclination to increase the national debt. He took his ground beforehand, and solemnly declared that he never would agree either to increase the tariff or create a new debt; and he called on all those who thought with him to resist, at the outset, any measure which led to those evils. He rejoiced at the crimination and recrimination which he heard on that floor between the two contending parties on the subject of extravagant expenditure. Both parties, in his opinion, were in fault; but the Opposition party, who were the most forward in making these charges, were certainly the most in fault. As an Opposition party it would be more becoming in them to do all in their power to check extravagant expenditures; but instead of that, it was mainly through their means that our expenditures had been so great. He warned the friends of the Administration that it was now time to economize. This year we might get through with our expenses without embarrassment, and so, also, as to the second year; but the third year the press would come, and we should have the utmost difficulty in making our resources meet the necessary wants of the Government.

Mr. BENTON observed that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] had arrayed before them the wounded men of the Revolution, mashed to pieces by ball, and covered with wounds, and asks if we would take away the small pittance which they received from the gratitude and justice of their country. He would tell that gentleman, that if this pension list is reduced to those who received wounds in the service of the country, these forty thousand pensioners will decrease more rapidly than did Falstaff's men in buckram. If the list was reduced to those who received wounds in the Revolution, or in the subsequent Indian wars, or in the late war with Great Britain, not one tithe of those who now enjoy pensions would be on the list. If for all those who were wounded in the Revolution, taking the whole of them together, forty thousand are to be pressed on our sympathies, every wounded soldier, every cripple would have to bear on his shoulders the burden of ten sound men. His voice would surely always be in favor of the meritorious soldier who served his country faithfully in the Revolution; but he could not agree that there was any justice or expediency in pensioning this large number. Mr. B. then took a view of the different pension acts, from 1818, up to this time, showing how the number of pensioners had gradually increased. He was sufficiently familiar with the subject to know that there are now put on the pension roll numbers who had enlisted after the surrender of Lord Cornwallis, and who never moved from their firesides; and these persons are all to be forced on our sympathies as wounded soldiers of the Revolution.

Mr. B. next spoke particularly against the impropriety of ingrafting on the ordinary appropriation bills for the support of Government objects which ought to stand on their own merits. The subject introduced by the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WALL] was one certainly worthy of an examination, and it ought to stand by itself.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed, that if he understood this amendment, he did not think that either the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] or the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] understood it. Unless he was mistaken, this was not a provision to pension men, but applied exclusively to old ladies, widows of revolutionary soldiers, and it was for them that this provision was to be made. Now, in any system of economy, he did not think we ought to attack the old ladies first; and as the Government of the United States had pledged itself to make them this payment, the amendment ought to pass. Whether the act creating these pensions was right or wrong, he would not undertake to say; but the law having been passed, we were bound in good faith to carry it into effect. The first law passed in 1836 provided that if a lady had married a revolutionary soldier before the term of his service expired, and had faithfully remained his widow ever since, that that widow, old, helpless, and faithful to her first husband, ought to receive from the bounty of the Government a sufficiency to preserve her from want. He had no doubt but the pension system had been grossly abused, and that some persons were on the list who did not deserve to be there; but if he were going to put it down, he would not for the first time violate the act of Congress by refusing to make the necessary appropriation to carry it into effect, as far as the ladies were concerned; and at all events he would not begin with them. The law of the last session was extended, so as to provide for those widows who were married up to January, 1794. He did not know whether he would have voted for this law or not; but it had been passed; it was now on the statute-book; the time of payment was drawing nigh, and an attempt was now made to withhold from these widows the pensions so promised them, by refusing to make the appropriation.

It had been objected that this bill was not the proper place in which to insert the provision for these pensions. Now, what was the appropriate sphere of an appropriation bill? Was it not to provide for carrying out the existing laws? and, if so, was there not here presented an existing law to be carried into effect? And did anybody suppose that any appropriation bill could now be introduced and passed in sufficient time to provide for these pensions by the 1st of January, when the certificates for them become due? The time to contend against the principle involved was when the bill passed, and not now, when the faith of the Government was committed. With regard to economy, he was glad to hear the sentiments that had been expressed on all sides. Economy, however, was a matter of detail, and not of generals, since the most extravagant men he had known had preached the best sermons in favor of economy. Now he, for his part, was prepared to act in detail, and resist these extravagant expenditures that had been so often referred to, one by one, whenever they should be proposed, though he should be charged with illiberality for so doing; but the last act of economy that he would practice, would be to withhold these pensions, after Congress had passed a solemn act declaring that it would provide for these widows who are now all near the grave, and make their old age comfortable. When the proper time came to examine into the pension list, he trusted that he would be willing to do that which economy as well as justice required. But he could not agree to make the case of these widows the first for the exercise of the former.

Mr. BENTON observed that the documents showed two classes of widows on the pension roll; the one class older than the last, who, perhaps, would not thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for making them out to be so ancient. The bill of the last session extended the pension list to those married up to 1794, and he supposed that the next thing would be to extend it to those who were married up to 1824, or even up to this time. He saw no reason for a distinction after going beyond those who were the matrons of the Revolution, staying at home attending to the duties of their families, while their husbands were absent fighting the battles of their country. This last mentioned class deserved their pensions, and were not to be compared with those who were girls when the last gun of the Revolution was fired, or, perhaps, not then born.

Mr. DAVIS said that the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON], who has just taken his seat, has shifted his ground somewhat on this subject. He was not disposed to consume time in following him. The day of payment of these pensions is at hand, and provision must be made for them. He did not think there was any gentleman who would oppose the appropriation on principle, though they might because they deemed it out of place. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] designates it as a mode of getting rid of the public money; a distribution bill, an iniquitous distribution bill. You may, sir, with just the same propriety, apply this to any other appropriation of the public money. I go on the ground that this is an appropriation for services rendered, and not a gratuity at all. The Senator also says it is a system peculiar to one portion or section of the country; he also says it is connected with the protective system. The honorable Senator should have recollected that the first act granting pensions to revolutionary soldiers passed in 1816, and the principal one in 1820; the tariff act was not passed till 1824, four years after the principal pension law was passed. These facts do not sustain the statement of the honorable Senator. He has instituted a comparison between the patriotism of South Carolina and Massachusetts.

Mr. CALHOUN disclaimed this; and said he had alluded to the difference of payment made on the claims of the respective States.

Mr. DAVIS. But these acts are not designed to reimburse States, but to pay individuals. If the records of the Revolution should be searched, it would be ascertained that Massachusetts furnished one third of the whole army that achieved our independence. It is asserted that there are frauds, and frauds of a gross character, in relation to these claims. If so, I am perfectly ready to have the names of the individuals guilty of them expunged from the pension roll; and not only that, but have them tried, and punished for the crime of perjury; but, unless further evidence was brought forward than had as yet been adduced, he would not believe it to be the fact. It is not just to attach this odious charge to these venerated and respected individuals, to whom we owe the political blessings we enjoy, and even the privilege of holding our seats here.

Mr. CALHOUN, in reply to Mr. DAVIS, said that when he spoke of the pension system as having grown out of the protective system, he, of course, excepted the act of 1818. That act (he said) originated in mistake. It was introduced and carried through by General Bloomfield; then a Senator from New Jersey, who declared himself willing to pledge his whole private fortune that the whole amount necessary to provide for the class of pensions introduced into that bill would not exceed two hundred thousand dollars. He, as Secretary of War, had to carry this act into effect; and, having made his calculations, the conclusion he arrived at was that it would require upwards of a million; but the amount expended under it, the very first year, was at least two millions, though he exercised the utmost vigilance to keep down the expense. Had he executed the law in a liberal spirit, the expenditure would have exceeded three millions.

After some further remarks from Mr. C. in opposition to the pension system generally, and from Mr. DAVIS in reply,

Mr. WALL said: My honorable friend from Missouri has said that this was an unusual course, and was calculated to retard the passage of, and defeat the bill to which it was offered as an amendment. But not so, sir. We passed this bill at the last session, and, taking care of ourselves, neglected to make provision for the payment of these old women; and we are called on by every motive of justice to do it now. Where is the difference between the bill and the amendment which is offered to it? What gives us the power to pass the bill for our compensation? Because it is a law upon the statute-book. What gives these old women a claim upon our justice? Because a law granting them compensation is upon the statute-book; and because I make a motion to that effect, the honorable gentleman takes occasion to charge me with an intention to defeat the passage of the appropriation bill and embarrass the operations of the Government. My honorable friend should have considered well before he made this charge. He has done me great injustice. I rejoice that I had the opportunity of making this motion. I could not have looked my constituents in the face had I neglected to provide for these poor, aged, and helpless women, tottering on the brink of the grave, in this inclement season, without a mouthful of food for sustenance, or house to shelter them.

Mr. BENTON said the Senator from New Jersey was mistaken in supposing that he charged him with a design to defeat this bill. He spoke only of the consequences resulting from mixing up incongruous matter in the same bill. As the gentleman from New Jersey was so anxious about these widows, he would ask him if those who were married on the second day of January, 1794; were not as much entitled to pensions as those who were married on the first? Would not every word of his pathetic appeal apply as well in behalf of all those who were married up to this day as to those who were married previous to 1st January, 1794?

Mr. MORRIS expressed great satisfaction at the discussion of this subject which had taken place. For his own part he was doubtful whether or not he should vote for this amendment. While he was opposed to our whole system of pensions, he acknowledged the obligation to provide for the carrying out the laws already enacted. Placed as he was on the Committee on Pensions, he occupied a false position. He doubted the propriety and beneficial tendency of the system, and thought that it was the parent of innumerable frauds. He agreed with the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] that it was time for us to pause in this business; to stop and look round us; that we might not only, by hasty and ill-advised measures, do much mischief by creating demands upon the Treasury and exhausting the means of the Government, but, by a false and pernicious system of gratuities, do an injury to those whom it was intended to benefit. The law of last session was passed against his better judgment. [Mr. M. here went into a recapitulation of the reasons that induced the Committee on Pensions to report the bill.] He contended that it was a gratuity; all pensions are gratuities. The soldier enters into service for the pay and emoluments of his rank, and all that he receives over and above is a gratuity. When the Treasury is drained, and we are straitened in our resources, he thought that in any scheme of retrenchment mere gratuities should be the first expenditures to begin with. He was in favor of lopping off all extraneous and unnecessary expenditures. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAvis] has asserted, and asserted repeatedly, that though Senators objected to this appropriation, on account of its being placed as an amendment to a common appropriation bill, yet no Senator had objected to the pension system, or would object to the system. He should be happy to see some gentleman submit a motion to instruct the Committee on Pensions to bring in a bill repealing the whole system. The honorable gentleman would then be convinced that there was one Senator at least who would take a stand against all this sort of feeling and sympathy which had been engendered by an array of an army of old ladies against us. We should not permit our feelings for ladies, either young or old, to prompt us to put our hands into the public Treasury. These pension bills find too easy access; they are passed too easily. I have known young athletic men to come before the committee and claim pensions granted to their mothers or other relatives, and when granted, claim them as their own. Why, it was made a mere business of; as soon as a law was passed, claims were hunted up by agents and others that would have never been thought of. Persons who have no disposition to enter into this business, are induced to do so by representations that their claim was as good as another's; that the Treasury was full, and Congress did not know what to do with the public money. When the first act was passed, providing for the soldiers of the Revolution who were in need of pecuniary assistance, many of them were in comfortable circumstances. They were induced to convey their property to their sons, took the oath of poverty, and received their pensions. Was not this a fraud, morally speaking, and a fraud tempted by the legislation of this Government? Notwithstanding the great number of persons on the pension list, at least five claims were rejected to every one that was granted, producing a great deal of hatred and ill will to the Government, because every claimant thinks his claim, and his right to a pension, as good as another's.

With these views of the present pension system, I am prepared to repeal it. I think it injurious to the country, and of comparatively little good to those intended to be benefited. I am willing that the invalids and soldiers of the Revolution should be provided for. As regards the act the appropriation for which is under consideration, he thought that, so far as due, the pension should be paid. Until the law is changed we should comply with its provisions, but the amount already called for under its provisions should warn us of the impolicy of continuing the system. Here are already one thousand women enrolled since last year, and how many more will be enrolled no one can tell. He hoped that something would be done by Congress at an early day as a guide for the action of the Committee on Pensions; whether we should recommend those cases that appealed to our sympathies, or those of whose justice our reason was convinced. He thought the whole system was liable to objection; that, even to the aged veterans intended to be benefited by it, it has operated as an injury. By throwing them on the pittance of eight dollars a month, they have been induced to neglect honest industry, and have been brought to poverty. He hoped that some member, who had taken an active part in this discussion, would bring forward a proposition to repeal the law, and he would be prepared to spread his views before the Senate and the country.

Mr. PIERCE said: When I rose at the same moment with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] it was with the intention of making some explanations, which I considered due from the committee by whom the bill of last session, which has been so often referred to, was reported. Those explanations have been made, as I trust, satisfactorily, by the Senator who has just resumed his seat.

The attention of the Senate has been called, in the progress of this debate, not only to the pension system generally, but, as is not unusual here, to various other matters, historical, political, and financial. With these topics I have at present nothing to do; and although I have very decided opinions as to the inequality and injustice of some of the provisions of the various pension laws, and a much stronger belief than I could desire to entertain of frauds perpetrated under them, still the proposition now pending to meet obligations imposed by existing laws does not appear to me to be the appropriate one for discussing the policy of past legislation. That question, as applicable to this subject, I will say, in reply to a remark of the Senator near me, I shall probably have occasion to raise in a few days, by the introduction of a bill to provide for the punishment of certain frauds committed on persons claiming pensions, and for other purposes.

Whatever might have become the subjects of speculation in these times, when the imaginations of men seem to be unusually occupied with schemes for acquiring sudden and abundant riches without labor, one would have expected that the soldiers of the Revolution and their widows might have escaped the grasping avarice of all men, however destitute of principle. But such is not the fact; as an American citizen, I say it with shame; but the truth must be told; it must be told, for the protection of the feeble, the ignorant, and the unsuspecting. Such frauds, I am assured by information derived from various sources, and in part from the Department which has charge of this subject, are extensive as they are disgraceful. For the benefit of successful claimants, who may draw their first payments before the bill to which I have referred can be considered by Congress, I desire at this time, and upon this proposition for an appropriation, to make a few remarks.

I have been informed, and believe it to be true, that the passage of the law of July last, and the passage of preceding laws of a similar character, have been the signal for agents to traverse the country in every direction in search of the aged and imbecile persons therein provided for; not with the laudable motive of assisting them to secure their rights at the least possible expense, but to practice upon their credulity, and impose upon their weakness and their ignorance. It is notorious that contracts have not unfrequently been made by such agents by which, if successful, they were to receive a large portion of the amount which should first be drawn; in many instances twenty-five per cent., in others fifty per cent., and in some even more; and in cases where no special contract has been made, the most exorbitant fees have been demanded and paid. Since my arrival in this city, I have received a letter giving the name of a certain agent who obtained, during the last summer or the early part of autumn, a certificate for an aged widow, under the act of 1836, by which she was entitled to receive, in September last, $600. The money was duly paid, and the agent claimed and retained for his services the sum of $250. I name this as an individual instance recently brought to my knowledge. A fair and liberal compensation for all services rendered and expenses incurred, in ordinary cases, under the act of the last session, would be from five to ten dollars; in very few instances should such compensation exceed the latter sum, the evidence of the husband's service being generally on file in the Department.

It may be asked how the claimants are induced to make such contracts, when the provisions of the law are plain, and the regulations of the Department simple and easy to be complied with, and why they submit to such exorbitant charges? The answer is obvious. The beneficiaries are usually in the humble and obscure walks of life, poor and infirm, imbecile through age, and ignorant of the steps necessary to be taken. Besides, they are too much elated with the prospect of obtaining any sum, however trifling, to relieve their immediate necessities, to cavil about terms; and they eagerly embrace the first proffer of assistance. Is it surprising, under all the circumstances, that in their second childhood they should become the ready dupes of artful and dishonest men? However, I have nothing to do with the means by which agents are enabled to cheat and defraud the pensioner. The thing has been done, and I fear will continue to be done, as long as money shall be drawn from your Treasury for these purposes. Pensioners have been robbed of no small portion of the pittance intended to be secured to them, and them alone. Yes, sir, worse than robbed; for men who have so far forgotten their manhood, nay, who have so entirely cast off all sense of honor and common honesty, as to speculate upon and plunder revolutionary soldiers, or the helpless widows who may survive them, are sunk in disgrace infinitely below the level of the brigand, who openly confronts you upon the highway and demands your purse. Thus much I have thought it my duty to say, to put persons entitled to pensions upon their guard against these cormorants; and I hope that my remarks may fall not only under the observation of the agents, who have argus eyes for everything relating to this subject, but that they may reach some of the worthy claimants. If they shall have any effect in preventing injustice and extortion, my object will be attained. All such agreements as I have before alluded to are conceived and consummated in fraud, and are in direct violation of the spirit and intention of the law. They are in no way obligatory, legally or morally, and should be so regarded by the pensioner.

Mr. WRIGHT made a brief explanation of the reasons which prevented the Committee on Finance from recommending this amendment when applied to do so by the Senator from New Jersey. Although he thought that this appropriation ought to be made, inasmuch as it was called for by an express law of Congress, which all admitted ought to be carried into effect; yet, as it was an appropriation sui generis, and had always been provided for by the House of Representatives in a separate bill, he thought it ought not to be ingrafted on the bill then before them, and would prefer its coming from the House of Representatives, where it ought properly to originate, in a bill of its own.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not intend to go farther into this question, but he rose to protest against its being admitted that this body was not competent to originate appropriation bills. He knew that, upon a very late occasion, when an attempt was made in that body to introduce a large appropriation in a House bill, this question was raised, but he resisted the principle then. It was true that burdens laid on the people must originate in the House of Representatives; but after the money has gone into the Treasury, it was giving up too much by the Senate to admit that they have no right to originate an appropriation of it.

Mr. WRIGHT explained. He never doubted the right of the Senate, as claimed by the Senator from Pennsylvania; he only spoke of the practice.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the question was of practice, and not of power; for, on that occasion, gentlemen were very ready to exercise the latter. Though it had not been the practice in that body, since he had been there, yet to appropriate bills of that nature, coming from the House, large appropriations had been added. If he were to admit that the Senate ought not to originate such bills, the case presented by the Senator from New Jersey ought to be an exception to the rule. As to those widows who were married between 1783 and 1794, he did not know whether he would have voted for them or not; but as the faith of the Government was to be redeemed, and there was a large amount of arrears due from the time of the passage of the act till now, he hoped the amendment would be adopted. He did not believe there was a Senator present who would vote against the appropriation if it came up in a way he approved of. Even the Senator from South Carolina admitted that the faith of the Government was pledged. As this was a proposition to carry into effect an existing law, he must vote in the affirmative; but if it were not a proposition to carry into execution an existing law, he must consider that there was some force in the objections of gentlemen who had opposed it.

Mr. STRANGE said that he should vote against the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, for most of the reasons assigned by the gentlemen who had opposed it. He disliked taking up this matter of importance and connecting it with a matter of equal importance wholly dissimilar to it. In order to enable Senators to come to a correct conclusion with regard to it, it ought to stand on its own merits. It had been suggested, in the course of the debate, that there was a general law requiring these pensions to be paid at stated periods—in March and September. Now there certainly was time enough between this and March to provide for the cases embraced in this amendment, and the arrearages could be put off till that time. But this was a matter of great importance, and not a vague question of expediency only. He believed that it was part of a great system of raising the public money, and then spending it. He was not prepared to say whether this was a question of public faith; but, at all events, there ought to be an inquiry into the propriety of making the expenditure. He would not, however, have troubled the Senate at this late period of the day, but for the purpose of bringing to light some facts very appropriate at this time, when economy and retrenchment had been so much spoken of. At the last session he had the honor to say, in reply to charges of prodigality and extravagance that had been made against the Administration and its friends, that the Opposition itself was to blame for most of the extravagance that had been committed; and he had further said that the proof of this would be found by a reference to the Journals. His colleague the other day had repeated the same thing, and as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] had joined issue with him, and had challenged the production of proof, it would be an admission of erroneous assertion on their part if they did not bring it forward.

Repeated efforts had been made by those in the Opposition to inculcate the belief that the Administration was guilty of the greatest extravagance, and the only way to meet these charges was to come forward with the proof. He had had but little opportunity since the charge was made of supplying himself with all the proof that could be found; but he had, however, turned over the leaves of the Journal since the last session, and found that every charge made by his colleague was fully substantiated. He would cite a few cases for the information of the Senate, by which they might judge of the whole. He found at the last session that the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was several times before the Senate; and as this bill involved a heavy expenditure, he would refer to it first in order:

"On motion of Mr. TITTON to postpone the special order, for the purpose of taking up this bill, the yeas and nays were nearly equally divided; and he admitted that there were some gentlemen on both sides who voted against it.

The yeas were, Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, and Young.

"Those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright."

Now, in discussing this subject, he had always admitted that some few of the Administration party, for particular reasons, could always be found to vote for a number of these expenditures.

Again:

"On motion by Mr. NORVELL to lay this bill on the table, it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 19.

"The yeas were, Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Rives, Roane, Walker, Wall, and Williams.

"The nays were, Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Grundy, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster, White, and Young."

In page 328 of the Journal it will be found that "The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making appropriations for certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin; and having been amended, it was reported to the Senate.

"On motion by Mr. WALKER, further to amend the bill by adding thereto the following proviso: 'Provided always, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as to imply that the United States are pledged, or in any manner bound, to make any appropriations in future to make or construct said roads, or any part or portion of them,' it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 17.

"Those who voted in the affirmative were, Messrs. Allen, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Grundy, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Swift, Trotter, Walker, White, and Williams.

"Those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Prentiss, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Webster, and Young."

him to vote for it. It was the amendment of the act giving the assent of Congress to the act of the Legislature of Virginia, incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Turnpike Road Company.

Mr. S. here read the yeas and nays in which he was found voting in the affirmative.

In page 414 of the Journal would be found the passage of the Cumberland road bill, which was passed by the following vote:

"Those who voted in the affirmative were, Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster, Wright, and Young.

"Those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, and Williams."

After citing the unanimous vote on the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities, and which Mr. S. said no man had the hardihood to vote against, Mr. S. referred to the bill to purchase the right to use Dr. Boyd Reilly's vapor bath:

"On the question, 'Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time?' it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 20.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are, Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Robinson, Sevier, and Swift.

"Those who voted in the negative are, Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young."

How many of the Opposition were found voting against this expenditure?

On page 519 would be found the bill making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon lights, buoys, and for making surveys; the question on taking up this bill was decided—yeas 23, nays 14:

"The yeas were, Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Wall, Williams, and Wright.

"Those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Fulton, Lumpkin, Merrick, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, White, and Young."

How many of the Opposition (Mr. S. asked) were found voting against this measure? At a very late period of the last night of the session he rose for the purpose of stopping this bill; but it being found that a quorum was not present, he was prevailed upon not to persist in calling for the yeas and nays, as it would have put a stop to all the other business of the Senate.

The next vote to which he would advert, was the bill explanatory of the act regulating the pay and emoluments of the brevet officers:

"On the question 'Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time?' it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 18.

"Those who voted in the affirmative were, Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Trotter, and Wall.

"Those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Brown, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, White, Williams, Wright, and Young."

How many of the Opposition (Mr. S. asked) voted against this bill?

The harbor bill (Mr. S. continued) came up at half-past four o'clock, on the 6th of July, on motion of Mr. DAVIS. Mr. S. here read from the Journal as follows:

"On motion of Mr. DAVIS, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to provide for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, during the year 1838, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 11.

"Those who voted in the affirmative were, Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, Lyon, Merrick, Niles, Norvell, Robbins, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Williams, and Wright.

"Those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Brown, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Pierce, Preston, Trotter, Wall, and White."

How many of the Opposition voted against taking up this bill, which involved such heavy expenditures?

Mr. S. said that he would trouble the Senate with one more case, and that was the Indian appropriation bill, to which Mr. WHITE offered an amendment appropriating $150,000 for subsistence and expenses of such Indians west of the Mississippi, who, by reason of the recent emigration, &c., were unable to subsist themselves:

"Those who voted in the affirmative were, Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White.

"Those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Allen, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Hubbard, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, and Williams."

How many of the Opposition were found voting against this bill? He had no doubt of the fact that he could go through the whole Journal and produce similar results. In truth, almost any proposition would meet the views of some few friends of the Administration. But let the facts go before the country; he wished to produce no false impression. If the charge of extravagance recoiled on the Opposition, why, let it be known. His only object in making this explanation was to meet the challenge of the Senator from Massachusetts.

After some remarks from Mr. ALLEN, Mr. BENTON explained that he had just examined the Journals of last session, and found that the amendment to the bill which brought in this class of pensioners, by which the pension list was swelled up some two or three millions, was made and adopted, not only without the yeas and nays, but without even a division. It was thus seen that an affair of this magnitude crept into their legislation without being noticed by any Senator present.

A motion was made by Mr. CRITTENDEN to amend the amendment by inserting:

And provided further, That the act of July 7, 1838, be repealed after the 3d of March, 1839.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 18, 1838.

The first business in order was the motion made yesterday by Mr. WISE not to receive the petition presented by Mr. REED from certain inhabitants of Nantucket, praying Congress to open international relations with the Republic of Hayti.

Mr. GRENELL, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at some length in support of the right of petition—a right, he insisted, which had never been denied by the veriest despot on earth. He then expatiated on the great advantages that would accrue to this country by opening commercial negotiations with, and acknowledging the independence of, Hayti, where we now labored under great disadvantages, owing to the inequality of duties between goods carried in American vessels and in those of other nations which had recognized the nationality of that Republic. Mr. G. admitted that it did look to one sort of abolition, and that alone—the abolition of national distinctions founded on color—to which he was at a loss to conceive any possible objection.

Mr. FILLMORE expressed a hope that the question would be taken one way or the other, so as to allow other petitions to be presented.

Mr. LOOMIS then demanded the previous question.

Mr. WISE moved to lay the subject on the table; which took precedence of the demand for the previous question.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CUSHING inquired whether, if Mr. WISE's motion prevailed, it would not be, in substance, equivalent to refusing to receive the petition?

The SPEAKER replied that the petition would remain in the hands of the gentleman offering to present it; and the motion to receive would lie on the table, subject to be taken up at any future time the House might feel disposed to do so.

Mr. CUSHING. Then, in point of fact, the petition will not have been received?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

The question being taken, was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 121; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Banks, Boon, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Dennis, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Henry

Johnson, William C. Johnson, John W. Jones, Legare, Lewis, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Martin, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Montgomery, Pearce, Pope, Pratt, Rencher, Rhett, Robertson, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Southgate, Stanley, Stone, Stuart, Taliaferro, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yell—65.

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Darlington, Davee, Davies, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, James Garland, Giddings, William Graham, Grant, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Hammond, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Loomis, Marvin, Sampson Mason, May, Maxwell, McKay, McKenna, Menefee, Mercer, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Petrik, Phelps, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sheffer, Shepler, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Spencer, Stratton, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, Toucey, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yorke—121.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The main question, being, "Shall this petition be received by the House?" was then pronounced.

Mr. CUSHMAN asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which, being ordered, were—yeas 157, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Lorden, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Canbreleng, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Cheatham, Childs, Cleveland, Clowney, Coffin, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cranston, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Davee, Davies, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, James Garland, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Loomis, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McKenna, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Morgan, Murray, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Peck, Petrik, Phelps, Plumer, Potts, Pratt, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Shepler, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stratton, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, Toucey, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagner, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Worthington, and Yorke—157.

NAYS—Messrs. John Calhoun, John Campbell, Coles, Crockett, Dawson, Dennis, Glascock, James Graham, Griffin, Hawkins, Haynes, Jennifer, William C. Johnson, Legare, Lewis, Lyon, Mallory, Martin, Miller, Pope, Rhett, Robertson, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Stanley, Stone, Towns, Lewis Williams, Wise, Word, and Yell—32.

So the petition was received.

Mr. REED then moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. STUART moved to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. REED demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which, being ordered, were—yeas 84, nays 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bynum, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crockett, Dawson, Dennis, Farrington, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Griffin, Hall, Halsted, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Hubley, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Legare, Lewis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Menefee, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Parker, Paynter, Pearce, Petrik, Pope, Pratt, Rencher, Rhett, Rives, Robertson, Rumsey, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Southgate, Stanley, Stuart, Stone, Taliaferro, Titus, Towne, Wagner, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Worthington, and Yell—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Bicknell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Casey, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Cushman, Dunn, Edwards, Davies, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Hopkins, Howard, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jennifer, Kemble, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Loomis, Marvin, Sampson Mason, McKenna, Milligan, Morgan, Murray, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Parmenter, Peck, Phelps, Plumer, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sheffer, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Spencer, Stratton, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, Toucey, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Yorke—105.

So the House refused to lay the petition on the table; and it was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WISE said, being in a minority of thirty-two, he gave up the fight, and withdrew his motion made yesterday to reconsider the same reference of a similar petition presented by Mr. GRENELL.

Petitions and memorials, chiefly on the subject of abolition, &c., were presented by Messrs. LINCOLN, FLETCHER, HASTINGS, CALHOUN, and SALTONSTALL, of Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL presenting a petition similar to the others in relation to Hayti,

Mr. LEGARE objected to its reception, and went on to point out the distinction between a bona fide petition asking, as a commercial question, for the interchange of relations between the two countries, and those from the Abolitionists, got up for the purpose of subverting the ends and designs they had in view. Mr. L. then argued that the Constitution did not prohibit the House from refusing to receive a petition, any more than by giving full freedom of speech it authorized licentiousness of speech or blasphemy; and cited various cases in support of this ground, in the British Parliament, from "Hatsell's Precedents."

Mr. CUSHMAN then said that, at the rate they were going on, no business would be done during the session; and, to aid in progressing it, he demanded the previous question; but it was not sustained by the House—ayes 66, noes 79.

Mr. PETRIKIN then moved that the House adjourn: lost—75 to 89.

Mr. SALTONSTALL then proceeded to reply to Mr. LEGARE, and denied the imagined connection which that gentleman had contended for. He also denied the power of the House to refuse to receive any and all petitions whose language was in respectful terms, and cited the amendment of the Constitution on this subject to show that the right of petition had been secured to the people on the broadest possible ground. In the present case, he insisted, the petitioners asked only for a legitimate object, an object within the power of Congress, and which Congress had repeatedly acted on heretofore in similar cases. He again denied that this subject was connected with that of abolition, though he was prepared to meet the latter, and expressed a hope that the time was not far distant when that question would be met, and deliberately and calmly discussed, both by the North and the South.

Mr. HARRISON then renewed the motion to adjourn; which prevailing, The House adjourned.

The following gentlemen were appointed as the Committee on the Library: Messrs. POPE, CLEVELAND, and McCURE.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 19, 1838.

Hon. RICHARD M. JOHNSON, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, and Mr. MOUTON, Senator from the State of Louisiana, appeared in their places in the Senate.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented the petition of Dr. Boyd Reilly, stating that he has invented an apparatus for the application of steam and medicated vapor to the human body; that his invention has been introduced into the hospitals of the Army and Navy of the United States with great advantage; that he has expended a considerable portion of his time and money in perfecting his invention, asking compensation in consideration thereof. Mr. L. then moved to refer the petition to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition and papers of John Boyd, praying to be placed on the pension list in consequence of disabilities incurred in the late war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of William C. Easton, praying compensation for services rendered as clerk in the Commissary General's department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of the heirs of John C. Mackall, praying compensation for property destroyed during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of the heirs of John Bulford; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. FULTON presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of Arkansas, authorizing the sale of the sixteenth sections, reserved for the use of schools; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, several petitions and papers on the files of the last session were referred to appropriate Committees.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. PIERCE gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the punishment of frauds committed by applicants for pensions.

Mr. LYON gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of J. and W. Beeson and others.

Mr. NICHOLAS gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Charles Morgan.

Also, to bring in two other bills for the relief of persons whose names were not heard.

Mr. TALLMADGE gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the abolishment of imprisonment for debt in certain cases.

Mr. BROWN gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill supplementary to the act establishing branch mints of the United States.

Mr. FULTON gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the inhabitants of a certain township in Arkansas to surrender their school section, and enter other land in lieu thereof.

Mr. NILES gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of James M. White.

Mr. HUBBARD gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill allowing equitable commissions to agents for persons in whose favor awards have been made under treaties with foreign Powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due to the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RIVES, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to explain and amend the fifth section of the act of June 30, 1834, for the better organization of the United States marine corps; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. NORVELL, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to authorize the selection of lands for the benefit of the University of Michigan, instead of other lands which have been hitherto selected; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. N. also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. DAVIS, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Irvine Shubrick; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of certain persons therein named; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. RUGGLES, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Joseph Veazy; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. ROANE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill giving the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. R. also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill concerning the estates of lunatics and infants; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. CALHOUN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs-at-law of Edward Wade; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. HUBBARD, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Dr. Samuel White; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. ROBINSON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill establishing a surveyor general's office in Illinois.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill granting to the Mississippi and Rock River Canal Company a certain portion of the public lands for the purposes therein expressed.

Mr. Y. also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill granting to the Galena and Chicago Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands, and for other purposes.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill relinquishing to the State of Alabama her two per cent. fund, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WALKER, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill directing the President of the United States to cause certain lead mines in Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, to be offered for sale, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. FULTON, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of certain citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of the treaty with the Choctaw Indians, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, the bill for the support of the penitentiary in said District.

Mr. R., from the same committee, reported a bill to amend the act establishing a criminal court in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the memorial of James H. Clarke, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the message of the President and the report of the Postmaster General on the subject, reported a bill regulating the transmission of the mails upon railroads; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the petition of Peter Bary, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. H., from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of John Kurtz, surviving partner of Bowie & Kurtz, reported a bill for the relief of the owners of the ship Alleghany; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the bill for the protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of Missouri and Arkansas, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bills for the relief of Joseph Banks and Ephraim Sprague, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. TIPTON, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of the Georgia and Alabama Railroad Company, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the resolution of the Senate directing an inquiry into the expediency of paying Captain Snodgrass's company of Alabama volunteers, for services as an escort to the Cherokees, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the bill regulating the pay of masters in the Navy, reported the same without amendment.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, in perusing the late report of the Secretary of the Navy, he had been much pleased with its brevity, as well as clearness. In one respect, however, he had been disappointed; and that was, that the Secretary had not alluded to a subject which now occupied much attention in both France and England; he referred to steam vessels of war. If the accounts which we had received from both these countries were to be credited, these vessels must eventually, in a considerable degree, supersede all others in naval warfare. It would seem that the Governments of these two countries entertained this opinion, as there appeared recently to have been an emulation between them which should construct and employ the greatest number of these vessels in the shortest time. Mr. B. did not profess to be a competent judge in this question; but it was one of such importance as to demand the serious consideration of those who were; and it was solely for the purpose of directing public attention, as well as that of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to this subject, that he had offered the resolution. If steamships of war should prove to be as efficient for attack and defense as they were represented to be, both in French and English publications, our country would be placed in a most unfortunate condition in case of a war with either of those two nations. We must advance as the world advances; and it would be a signal disgrace that we, who were the first successfully to apply steam in propelling commercial vessels, should suffer by being the last in using it on vessels of war. Mr. B. hoped that, if the Committee on Naval Affairs should satisfy themselves of the utility of steam vessels for warlike purposes, we should not close this session without providing for the construction of one or more of them. Even the most skillful officers of our Navy would require much experience, he presumed, before they could become well qualified to command and manage a steam vessel. The French and the English were both, at this very moment, training their naval officers in this important service, on board of such vessels.

Mr. B. then submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the construction of one or more steam vessels of war, and their employment in the naval service.

Mr. BENTON observed that this subject of steam batteries was not a new one. It had been several years ago recommended to the consideration of Congress, by the Secretary of War, both in relation to coast and harbor defense; this report would be found among the detailed statements of the War Department. The report went into a description of the nature of the vessels recommended, as well as the situation of the coasts and harbors recommended to be defended by them.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that he never moved in any subject of this kind without first obtaining all the information it possessed. He certainly was not ignorant of all that had been done by the War Department on the subject, but it was not coast and harbor defense only that his resolution contemplated, but it referred to the building of steam vessels of war to act on the ocean. It was for the purpose of calling the attention of the Naval Committee and the public to the subject that he had introduced his resolution. What was the difficulty? Was not the object embraced in the resolution a proper subject of inquiry? All the scientific naval officers of the most powerful nations in the world were not only turning their attention to the subject, but, what was more, were training their officers to naval warfare in steam vessels. During the last summer he had received more than one dozen of publications made on the subject in Europe.

Mr. DAVIS was much obliged to the Senator from Pennsylvania for bringing this subject to the notice of the Senate. He should advocate his motion, and hoped the Naval Committee would give their serious attention to the subject, and report what information they may collect to the Senate and the country. In Great Britain and France this subject had occupied a great deal of attention, and in this country it had not been entirely overlooked. The Secretary of War had invited their attention to it, and the Committee on Military Affairs had brought the subject before the Senate, but it had not been acted upon except in a single case, that of the steam frigate Fulton, which is now in service as a vessel of experiment. It was a subject of deep importance to the country, and ought to be fully investigated. We ought to avail ourselves of the information to be derived from the experience of foreign nations, as well as that to be derived from the scientific among our own countrymen.

The resolution was then agreed to without a division.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON, on Monday last, was taken up, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate the correspondence of Commodore Porter, Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople; also, the correspondence of the consuls of the United States at Constantinople, Smyrna, Broussa, Salonica, Cyprus, Cos, Aleppo, Beirut, (inclusive of Damascus and Seyd,) Alexandria, and Candia, so far as the said correspondence relates to the commerce carried on within the Turkish dominions, and in the pachalik of Egypt, and may not, in the opinion of the President, be improper to be communicated.

The following resolution, also submitted by Mr. BENTON, was also taken up, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to report to the Senate, at the commencement of the next stated session of Congress, the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with all foreign nations, so as to show how far the commerce and navigation of this Republic are favored and encouraged, or burdened and restricted, in different countries.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the appointment of a Minister Resident at Constantinople, instead of a Chargé d'Affaires; and that the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a salary, in addition to fees, to the United States consul at the same place.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate general statements in relation to the salt duties, the importation of foreign salt free of duty, in the fisheries of the United States, and also in the beef and pork trade, showing—

1. The quantity of salt annually imported into the United States since the year 1789, and the places where imported, with the total value thereof from each place, and the average original cost thereof per bushel, and the average quarterly market price in New York.

2. The annual amount of drawback paid on salt used in curing fish, beef, and pork for export, and of all bounties and allowances in fishing vessels, in lieu of a drawback of the salt duty, and as a commutation and equivalent therefor; so as to show the annual amount of the salt tax refunded or commuted to the curers of fish imported, and also the amount of the tax refunded to exporters of beef and pork, so long as beef and pork enjoyed that benefit.

3. The same amounts computed in bushels of salt, so as to show the annual quantity of salt free of duty which has been used or allowed for in the fisheries to the present time, and also in the beef and pork trade, so long as exported beef and pork were entitled to a drawback of all the salt duty.

Mr. RIVES submitted the following resolution; which lies over one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, the information called for under the following heads of inquiry:

1. The period at which the third bond of the Bank of the United States, sold to that institution, amounting to $2,254,871 38, was placed to the credit of the Treasurer on the books of the bank; the terms on which it was negotiated: the person acting on behalf of the bank, with whom the negotiation was made; the particulars of any understanding or agreement that the proceeds of the same should be left on deposit with said bank, until wanted in the ordinary disbursements of the Government; and what understanding and arrangement, if any, has taken place respecting the benefit which might accrue to the bank in the transfer of money it should make to distant places on account of the Government.

2. The period when the sum of $1,600,000, in part payment of the same bond of the Bank of the United States, was placed to the credit of the Treasurer by that bank, and the nature of the agreement or understanding had in reference to the payment of a part of said bond before, and of another part after it became due.

3. Whether any sum or sums of the public money have been deposited in the Bank of the United States, other than those derived from the payment or sale of its bonds; if so, the amount and date of each deposit, and by whom and by whose authority and direction they were made.

4. The aggregate balance standing weekly to the credit of the Treasurer in the Bank of the United States, its branches or agencies, whether subject to draft or not, as well as the weekly aggregate balance in the Treasury from the time the first deposit was made in the said bank of moneys arising from the payment or sale of its bonds up to the present period.

5. A list of all its branches, or agencies of the said Bank of the United States, on which the Treasury Department has drawn drafts, the amount of public moneys directed to be placed at each, and of the drafts severally drawn on them, and the rates of exchange between Philadelphia and each of the places to which sums were ordered to be transferred.

6. The amount, so far as it can be conveniently ascertained, that has been drawn from the Bank of the United States, its branches or agencies, or in notes of said bank, for paying Indian annuities, or other claims of the Indians on the Government, or for defraying the expenses attending the removal of the Indians; and, in general, the nature of the arrangements, if any, made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank; together with all the correspondence, agreements, and instructions given or entered into, connected with any or all the heads of inquiry above stated.

Resolved, also, That he communicate the nature of the arrangements made with him by those banks in which, according to his report of the 3d instant, portions of the public money have been "placed to the credit of the Treasurer on special deposit;" the kind of money in which the said special deposits were made; whether the same were entered on the books of the banks; whether the identical moneys deposited have continued to be held by the banks; whether the drafts of the Treasury Department that have been drawn on those deposits have been paid in the specific moneys deposited; and whether the balances accruing are part and parcel of the very moneys originally deposited.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of War to make reasonable and just compensation to agents employed in the payment of pensioners.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of ceding to the State of Illinois such of the public lands as remain unsold in the "American Bottom," in that State, which extend along the Mississippi river, from the mouth of Wood river to the mouth of the Kaskaskia river, and are bounded by the bluffs or highlands on the one side and the river on the other; for the purpose of aiding said State in improving the health of its citizens by draining the lakes, ponds, and marshes in that part of the country.

In presenting the above resolution, Mr. Y. said: I hold in my hand, Mr. President, a report made by the president of the board of managers of the Illinois State Lottery, authorized by the General Assembly of that State for the purpose of draining the lakes and ponds, and improving the health of the citizens residing in the "American Bottom," a strip of country extending from the mouth of Wood river, a short distance above the mouth of the Missouri river, to the mouth of the Kaskaskia river, and stretching along the easterly side of the Mississippi river about one hundred miles, with an average width of from three to seven miles. The quantity of land embraced within the area is estimated at about four hundred square miles, or about two hundred and sixty thousand acres; of which only a small portion of refuse, marshy, and unsalable land remains the property of the United States, although it has been in market more than twenty years. The first settlements made by the white people in Illinois were made by the French, at Kaskaskia, Fort Chartres, St. Philips, Cahokia, Prairie Du Pont, Prairie du Rocher, and a few other smaller villages. It is believed that in the year 1812, the population of the "American Bottom" was greater than now. This is attributed to bad health, arising from the stagnant ponds and lakes in that part of the country. The report states that the once flourishing villages of Fort Chartres, St. Philips, and Prairie Du Pont, are now only known by the ruins, and the inscriptions over the remains of the dead; that the towns of Cahokia, Harrisonville, and Prairie du Rocher are in a state of great dilapidation; and that there is but little prospect of improvement in that part of the country, unless something shall be done to render the unoccupied portions of the country inhabitable for agricultural and other purposes. The board of managers, therefore, ask for a donation of those marsh lands to the State, for the purpose of aiding in the proposed improvement of the country, in the hope that Congress will not refuse to promote, in the manner proposed, so important and laudable an undertaking.

The resolution was then adopted.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of William East;

The bill to prevent the counterfeiting of foreign coin, and for the punishment thereof;

The bill to amend the act to punish certain offenses against the United States;

The bill confirming the sales of certain reservations;

The bill granting to the county of Kalamazoo, State of Michigan, the right of preemption to certain quarter sections of the public lands;

The bill for the relief of John Newton;

The bill for the relief of Jean B. Valle;

The bill to amend the act entitled an act to require the judges of the district of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State; and

The bill further to postpone the fourth installment of the deposit with the States.

The bill for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay was, after considerable debate, postponed until Monday next.

The question on ordering the bill for the relief of Laurent B. Millaudon to a third reading was reconsidered, and the bill, after a considerable debate, was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 19, 1838.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the First Comptroller of the Treasury, in conformity to an act of Congress, inclosing a statement of the accounts that have remained unsettled, or on which balances appear to be due, for more than three years prior to the 30th September, 1838, on the books of the Fourth Auditor; which,

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to that Department, in regard to the operations of the General Land Office during the year 1837, and part of the year 1838.

On motion of Mr. CASEY, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of June last, in relation to the accounts of Major Cross, and other matters.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a report and documents relative to the petition of John Peebles, collector of internal duties for first, second, third, fourth, and fifth districts of Ohio, which was referred to that officer by the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives at its last session.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPUBLIC OF HAYTI.

The unfinished business was the question of reception of a petition presented by Mr. SALTONSTALL from certain citizens of the town of Converse, Massachusetts, praying for the establishment of international relations with Hayti.

Mr. HARRISON, who was entitled to the floor, said, in view of the shortness of the session, of the vast amount of business before the House, and that, up to this time, they had done nothing, he thought this discussion should be brought to a close, and he, therefore, demanded the previous question; which was carried without a division, as was also the main question, "Shall this petition be received?"

The petition, being therefore received, was, on motion of Mr. SALTONSTALL, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, asked leave to submit the following amendment to the rules of the House:

Resolved, That the following be added to, and constitute one of, the standing rules of the House: "If, upon the presentation of a petition, objection be made to receiving the same, the question shall be put and decided without debate."

Objection being made,

Mr. WILLIAMS moved a suspension of the rules; on which motion

Mr. SLADE demanded the yeas and nays, and, being ordered, they were—yeas 91, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Beers, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bronson, Bynum, Casey, Chambers, Chapman, Cheatham, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cushman, De Graff, Duncan, Ewing, Farrington, Fillmore, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Graves, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Thomas B. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—101.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

AFFAIRS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The following message in writing was received from the President of the United States by the hands of his Private Secretary:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit the accompanying documents, marked from one to five, in reply to a resolution of yesterday's date, calling for copies of correspondence between the Executive of the Federal Government and the Governor of Pennsylvania, in relation to "a call of the latter for an armed force of the United States troops since the present session of Congress," and requiring information "whether any officer of the United States instigated or participated" in the riotous proceedings referred to in the resolution, and "what measures, if any, the President has taken to investigate and punish the said acts, and whether any such officer still remains in the service of the United States."

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 18, 1838.

[The documents accompanying this message are of an important character. They are so voluminous as to preclude their publication in tonight's paper; but so soon as we shall obtain a copy, they will be given to the public.]

The message and accompanying documents having been read,

Mr. NAYLOR moved that they be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed; and addressed the House at some length in support of his motion. He said this inquiry had been made by a certain party in that House, and he was now willing to meet it to the fullest extent. He remarked, with much warmth, upon the fact of Governor Wolf anticipating what had taken place, as going to show there was a regularly organized conspiracy on the part of the officers and adherents of the General Government, concocted in Philadelphia, some of whom had taken an active part in it. Mr. N. then went again into the transactions at Harrisburg, and the part taken there by Messrs. Page, M'Can, and others.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was at a loss to see any good that could arise from the further discussion of this matter, or of referring it to a Committee of the Whole for discussion, from day to day, and therefore he felt as if he was discharging a duty to himself and the balance of the members by moving that these documents be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. POTTER begged the gentleman to withdraw the motion for a few minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD would do so on condition of the gentleman's renewing it.

Mr. POTTER pledged himself to do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD withdrew the motion.

Mr. POTTER commenced by stating that he had the pleasure of informing the House he had every reason to hope that all the difficulties that had unfortunately prevailed in Pennsylvania had been brought to a peaceable and permanent termination, and that three distinguished patriots, men who are—

Mr. BIDDLE called his colleague to order for making a reference to the proceedings at Harrisburg.

Mr. POTTER had only made a single allusion to them, while his other colleague [Mr. NAYLOR] had been permitted to go into and dilate upon their history. Mr. P.'s object was to prevent any further action on the whole subject. There was excitement enough now in Pennsylvania without creating any more; and he was merely stating a fact to show why it was unnecessary, in his judgment, to refer this subject. As he was saying, he believed the question was settled in Pennsylvania itself, for there was where it must be ultimately settled, for they would permit the interference neither of the National nor of any State Government, further than the Constitution warranted. He believed everything was at peace in that State now; while we are discussing the matter here, and keeping up the excitement. He had just returned from Harrisburg, and a more peaceable or more orderly community was not to be found within the bounds of this Union than he left there. He was satisfied, too, that the rights of the people were safe, for they were in hands who knew them, and, knowing, dare maintain them. The House of Representatives of Pennsylvania is now, he believed, proceeding as quietly and orderly as ourselves.

With reference to the postmaster at Philadelphia, Mr. P. would inform his colleague that he had been called to Harrisburg by the requisition of Governor Ritner, and that he had returned without one drop of blood having been shed.

Mr. P. concurred with his colleague in the position that a conspiracy had existed in Pennsylvania—a conspiracy to trample down the rights of free government, and strike at the foundation of liberty itself—a conspiracy to usurp the government of one of the thirteen original States of this Union, contrary to the Constitution, contrary to the laws, and contrary to all the institutions of our country—a conspiracy for a minority to grasp power over the majority—a conspiracy to retain, for purposes best known to themselves, the functions of the government of Pennsylvania for a short time. That conspiracy was announced long since, but not by the political party to which his colleague had attributed it. No. It was announced and proclaimed by the very officer who had surreptitiously concealed and kept back the returns to the Legislature of Pennsylvania. Hence, then, Mr. P. concurred in opinion with his colleague, that there was a conspiracy, but the gentleman's friends were answerable for it.

Mr. P. defended Governor Wolf for the course he had pursued in cautioning the custom-house officers. That gentleman could not but anticipate excitement, for the public press declared it in advance—the officers of the State government at Harrisburg proclaimed it—and his caution was proper, called for by the probable state of things, and only what duty required of him. Mr. P. concluded by renewing the motion to lay on the table and print; and it was agreed to without a division.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, from the select committee thereon, reported, with amendments, the bill to prohibit duelling in the District of Columbia, and to provide for the punishment thereof.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making an appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier of the United States.

Also, a bill making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the year 1839.

Also, a bill for the relief of Chastelain and others.

At the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House, by general consent, took up the motion made by him at the beginning of the session, to refer so much of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury as related to the defalcations of the late collector at New York to a select committee, and so much thereof as related to a modification of the revenue laws to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WISE moved the reference of the former to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceeded to address the House in support of that motion, and also on the subject generally, going into a history of Swartwout's and other cases of fraud and peculation that had occurred under the late and present Administration. After proceeding for some time, he gave way, without concluding, to Mr. STANLY, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 20, 1838.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of the administrators and heirs-at-law of William Terrill; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, presented a petition of William Dorsey, register of lands in the northeastern district of Mississippi, asking compensation for additional clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Mrs. Mary W. Thompson, widow of Colonel Alexander Thompson, who fell in an action with the Seminole Indians, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of Russell Comstock, praying Congress to purchase and publish certain discoveries alleged to have been made by him to promote the preservation and increase of agricultural products, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, praying that Congress would adopt some measures that would increase the proportion of American seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of William Triplett, praying for confirmation of title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. KING presented a memorial of the Gainesville and Narketa Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. RIVES gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Thomas P. Parson.

Mr. DAVIS gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Elisha Eldridge.

Also, a bill for the relief of the Nantucket Steamboat Company.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PRENTISS, agreeably to notice given, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of the administrator of Joseph Edson; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HUBBARD, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill allowing equitable commissions to agents for persons in whose favor awards have been made under treaties with foreign Powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due to the United States; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. RIVES, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Andrew Forest; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. R. also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to establish the Navy ration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TALLMADGE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROANE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to extend the jurisdiction of the corporation of the city of Washington over the Potomac bridge, and to authorize the making of deeds for certain lots in said city; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. R. also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the erection of a hospital in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RUGGLES, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Isaac Hilton; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NICHOLAS, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Charles Morgan; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. N. also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Jean Baptiste Grainger; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BROWN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill supplementary to the act establishing branch mints of the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to authorize the inhabitants of township eight north, of range thirty-two, to surrender their school section, and enter a section in lieu thereof; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. F. also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to authorize the location of preemption certificates given by the register of public lands at Batesville, Arkansas, under law of 26th May, 1838, on any public lands in Arkansas; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NILES, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Jabez L. White and Asa White; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. MORRIS asked leave to move a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, by which the bill to punish the counterfeiting of certain coins was passed; which was granted by unanimous consent.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings, reported the bill to authorize the examination and payment of the claims of the workmen on the public buildings, without amendment.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Bassett; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the same committee, reported the following bills, without amendment:

A bill to establish a pension agency in Montpelier, Vermont;

A bill for the relief of John McCloud; and

A bill granting a pension to David Waller.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of the 7th of July, 1838, "to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," as to provide that every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed in navigating any steamboat or vessel, propelled in whole or in part by steam, who shall willfully increase and confine the steam of such boat or vessel, with intent to propel her at a speed greater than her ordinary speed, on any pretext whatever, or who shall willfully run such boat or vessel at a speed greater than her ordinary speed, against or with any other boat or vessel at a trial of speed, although no explosion or loss of life shall occur thereby, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding five thousand dollars; and, also, that said committee inquire into the expediency of requiring a printed copy of the above entitled act, and the amendments that may be made thereto, to be kept at all times in a public part of the cabin of such boat or vessel, for the inspection of the passengers.

Mr. BENTON offered the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate copies of all the orders and instructions issued from Washington city, by heads of Departments and the Postmaster General, relative to the kind of money and bank notes which might be paid out on account of the United States or the Post

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, BY BLAIR & RIVES.

25TH CONGRESS, 3D SESSION.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1838.

VOL. 7.....No. 4.

Office Department, since the 14th day of April, 1814, when Congress, by law, forbid any bank note to be "offered" in payment on public account, in any case whatsoever, except of the character and description there specifically defined.

Mr. BENTON also offered the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate, as early as may be convenient after the Mint returns for the present year are received, statements showing:

1. The amount of imports and exports of gold and silver coin and bullion since the passage of the act for correcting the standard of the gold coins of the United States, and for admitting the silver coins of Mexico and other countries to legal circulation within the United States, passed June, 1834.

2. The amount of gold coined at the Mint and its branches since the gold bill of 1834 took effect, distinguishing the bullion from which the same was coined, so as to show how much was coined from foreign gold, how much from United States coins of the former standard, and how much from gold of the United States mines.

3. The annual average of the notes of the late Bank of the United States in circulation during the existence of that institution.

Mr. NORVELL offered the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for the improvement of the harbors of Brest, Port Sheldon, and New Buffalo, and of the harbors at the mouths of Clinton, Grand, Kalamazoo, North, and South Black rivers, in the State of Michigan; and also into the expediency of making appropriations for the construction of a pier and beacon light at Mackinac; for the removal of the bar in Lake George, in the straits of St. Mary; and for the removal of the obstructions to navigation at the mouth of the river St. Clair, in that State.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, it was Ordered, That the petition of James Smolley and others, presented at the last session, praying compensation for the services of the Vermont militia at Plattsburg in the late war, be referred, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, it was Ordered, That five hundred extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed for the use of that office.

PUBLIC DEPOSITS.

The resolutions submitted yesterday, by Mr. RIVES, proposing certain inquiries of the Secretary of the Treasury, coming up for consideration—

Mr. RIVES said he would submit some of the reasons for offering them more in detail than he had at first intended. The resolutions have special reference to certain transactions which have been lately alleged to have taken place between the head of the Treasury Department and the President of the Bank of the United States. For some time past, notwithstanding the long and arduous struggle between the Administration and this institution, rumors have been prevalent that an arrangement has been entered into by which it has practically become the fiscal agent of the Government. Does not the whole country recollect that the present President took an early occasion, soon after the bank had received its charter from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, to say that it was the same in character and effect as the former bank? Did not the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] assert that it was the same vast monopoly that had convulsed the country—the same thirty-five millions of capital—the same president—the same directors—the same stockholders? We all recollect the zeal of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] who has taken so distinguished a part in supporting the fiscal schemes of the present Administration, on the same subject. The honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] in referring to this institution, said that it was more powerful than the former bank, and more wicked as well as more powerful. Now, taking the views of the head and great pillars of the Administration party into consideration, it is surprising that this denounced institution, more wicked and more powerful, was reinstated in all its fiscal relations with the Government. From the prevalence of these reports, at the assembling of Congress we all looked to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to clear up these subjects; but, sir, in this document, on this matter, there appeared to be a premeditated reserve and studied ambiguity. Congress at its previous session, had authorized the sale of two of the bonds of the United States Bank held by the Government. The Secretary should have clearly stated to Congress the manner in which he had executed the special trust confided to him; but it was with the utmost difficulty, after the most minute scrutiny, that we can find a few lines informing us that the Secretary has executed this in accordance with the provisions of the law.

In the list of banks denominated special depositories of the Government, we are told that special deposits are made in the Bank of the United States, derived from debts due from banks; but from what banks the debts are due, or on what conditions the deposits are made, the Secretary is wholly silent. He thought that ambiguity of phraseology had been designedly used to conceal this transaction. The public have lately had a letter from the president of the bank, in which he comes out in bold language, with the air of a man who has achieved a triumph. He tells us that arrangements have been entered into, by which the Government has been brought into efficient cooperation with the Bank of the United States! That the more distant disbursements of the Government had been made in the notes of the bank—these rags, this miserable trash, as they have been designated by the honorable Senator from Missouri. Now, let us confront the statements of the two high contracting parties. The Secretary does not tell you to whom this bond was sold; the president of the bank says it was disposed of to the bank, and paid for by the credits on the books of the bank—a credit to the Treasurer of the United States on the books of the bank. The Secretary of the Treasury says it is a special deposit on the books of the bank. All these matters require explanation, and the Secretary should be glad I have given him the opportunity.

Was this a mere sale of bonds, or was it not a scheme to reinstate the bank in its character of fiscal agent of the Government? Was not the sale a mere form for covering the transaction? These are questions that concern the honor of the nation; and a full and unequivocal answer is expected. The public have a right to know on what terms the coalition between the Government and the bank has taken place; who furnishes the auxiliaries, and who furnishes the subsidies; whether the bank has abdicated the throne, that it may be the power behind the throne, greater than the throne itself.

Mr. R. gave extracts from the Baltimore Chronicle, and other Whig papers, to prove that by an insensible process, already commenced, the Bank of the United States would, without the concurrence of Congress, become the fiscal agent of the Government. Why, sir, this would be a national bank, and a national bank in its worst form—closely allied with the Executive; a State institution, irresponsible to Congress, and irresponsible to the people. I say, sir, if this insensible process, already commenced, is to be consummated, it will form that vast concentration of the moneyed power which the President, in his late message, speaks of with so much alarm. If this insensible process is to go on, if this coalition between the Government and the bank is to be completed, I will say—as was said of another coalition in another country—in the name of my country I forbid the bans.

Notwithstanding the many homilies we have received on the necessity of severing all connection between the fiscal affairs of the Government and the banks, the President and Secretary have given the most unequivocal proof, by their example and practice, of the superiority and almost indispensable necessity of bank agency in conducting the affairs of the Government. And the connection with banks is attempted to be got over by dubbing sixteen banks as special depositories. What are these special depositories? Banks employed at the will and pleasure of the Executive—making them solely Executive agents and Executive instruments. While the Executive is preaching against the system of bank agency, it is recommended that an occasional use may be made of them, when it is deemed convenient and proper. Who is to be the judge of this propriety? Why the Executive; their hands must not be fettered by the legislation of Congress; they must employ them at their own will and pleasure; thus making this immense money power subservient to Executive views. All admit that, with the experience of the last few months, banks are infinitely safer agents than sub-treasurers; but the sub-Treasury will be held up for party purposes, and perhaps for the extension of Executive patronage and influence. The Administration means to employ banks, and the only question is, whether we will have their employment legalized, or subject them entirely to Executive discretion. The time has come when every patriot should watch with deep anxiety and solicitude the indications of Executive policy. If this moneyed power is to be subject to Executive will, it will destroy the liberties of the country, and make Executive power ascendant over everything. He would also allude to the unprecedented and unconstitutional recommendation of the President to appoint a committee of Congress to watch his sub-treasurers, and report the defaulters to him for removal. He hoped he would not live to see this degradation of Congress appointing inquisitorial committees to watch the Executive's sub-treasurers. The President says that recent events have convinced him more and more of the propriety of the sub-Treasury system. What are these recent events? The defalcation of public officers for immense sums, and flying the country. Not even the shrine of the national honor has been sacred from this humiliation—I mean the Army. The ermine of the law has been stained with dishonor. These defalcations of public officers, though humiliating, are providential evils, in contributing to defeat a system, the infliction of which upon the country I deem would be a curse. Cannot we devote one session of Congress to binding up the wounds of our bleeding country, instead of wasting the time in party conflicts and trying for party triumphs!

Mr. WRIGHT rose to say a few words in reply to the honorable gentleman from Virginia. He did not rise now for the purpose of entering into any debate on the question of the Sub-Treasury, or of the bank deposits, believing that any argument on these questions would now be out of place. He hoped and believed, notwithstanding the Senator's remarks, that he was to be permitted to congratulate himself and the country that the Senator had at last become aware of the dangers and mischiefs arising from a connection between the Government and the banks. He was glad to hear the Senator's remarks, so far as they were connected with the facts, and the only drawback to his pleasure was, that the gentleman had not waited for facts before he drew his inferences. Another remark with which he would now trouble the Senate. He well remembered at the extra session, and at the last annual session, he was repeatedly told by several members, that when we undertook to talk of the dangers of this Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, we were attempting to raise a phantom; that the late Bank of the United States was dead and gone, and that it was an imposition on the country to say that there was longer any danger from that quarter. He remembered that observations such as these fell from the Senator from Virginia himself, and he was happy to find that the gentleman had changed his opinions. He never was himself deluded for a moment with regard to that institution; the opinions that he now entertained of it were the same that he had always held. The Senator then would naturally ask, did he approve of this connection? He would answer, that he did not know. He was exceedingly glad that the Senator had offered his resolution of inquiry, and wished the Senate and country to be put in possession of the information it called for. When that information came, he would be able to form a correct opinion on the subject.

He had heard that, under the legislation of the last winter, the Secretary had sold one of the bonds given by the Bank of the United States, to the bank itself. He presumed, therefore, that the connection, as he had heard on report, grew exclusively out of that transaction. If this connection had gone further, it had been without his knowledge, and should be without his approbation. He did not undertake to say that he approved of the manner in which the bond was transferred, but he had heard that no other purchaser of the bond was to be found. He had heard that means were found wanting to pay the public debt, and for this purpose, the sale was made in the manner it had been. So far he was willing to rest until the Secretary gave them the facts; and he should have been much better pleased if the Senator from Virginia had permitted the call to be answered, and the facts to be laid before them, before he drew his inferences. He was not so much surprised at that course of the Senator, as at the next step he took; and what was that? Why, it was to interpret to the Senate and the country, not only the cause of action, but the views and opinions of the President of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the policy of the Government, from the letter of Nicholas Biddle, who has not hitherto been the authority from which the action of these gentlemen has been accustomed to be judged. It might have become authority with the gentleman now; but, if it had, the gentleman had information which he (Mr. W.) did not possess. But, in the heat of remark, the letter referred to was not enough, and the comments of the Opposition newspapers was made the authority for the opinions and policy of the Administration, by the honorable Senator from Virginia. He would only observe, that when the acts and opinions of the Administration are to be judged of by him, it should not be from the comments of the Baltimore Chronicle.

It did seem to him that the natural course would have been to have let these inquiries go to the Secretary, and to have received his answer before coming to any conclusion with regard to facts yet to be known. If the facts which shall be given by the Secretary should prove unsatisfactory, there will be abundant opportunity for the Senate to express its disapproval; and they should do this from the facts before them, and not from such sources as the letter of Nicholas Biddle and the comments of Opposition newspapers. In the course of his remarks, the Senator thought proper to refer to that portion of the message of the President in which he recommended the appointment of a committee of Congress to examine into the conduct of the disbursing agents of the Government. He had not the message before him; but, if he recollected its language, he would submit to the Senator whether the part he referred to was not to this effect: That this committee should report to the President, in case defalcations should be found to exist, to the end solely that the defaulting officer might be promptly removed; and that they should, in any event, report to Congress, that it might apply such legislation as it thought proper. Was not this the sum and substance of that portion of the President's message?

Mr. RIVES answered in the affirmative.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, it was; and was it a candid exposition to the Senate and to the country that the Senator from Virginia gave of the President's recommendation? He would ask if it would not have been but justice, both to the document and to the officer, to have given the purport for which the recommendation by the President of the appointment of a committee of Congress was made? and would it not have been but just to have stated the further fact that a final report was to be made to Congress? It seemed so to him; and with that remark he would let the matter rest. One single observation more, and he was done. Had some of the remarks of the honorable Senator, under the circumstances, have come from one of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, it would not have surprised him. Such liberties were often taken by political opponents in all parliamentary bodies, and it was not always that gentlemen in the opposition felt bound to give all the facts for the purpose of basing their remarks. But such remarks, coming from one standing in the relation of the honorable Senator, he could not but regret. He remembered that during the recess some one, describing the position of this honorable Senator, spoke of him as maintaining an armed neutrality, standing between the two great contending parties in this country. Now, he was compelled to admit that if the gentleman's position was that of an armed neutrality, that position had not precisely been understood by him. If it meant hostility to both the great belligerents, that definition was not the one he had given to it, and he should hereafter be compelled to understand it in a different light from that in which he now did.

Mr. RIVES begged leave to say a few words in reply. He would as soon have believed that the sun would have fallen from the firmament as that the President would have restored the connection between the bank and the Government. This Government has altered its relations with the bank since its last session; and am I to be reproached with my confidence in it? The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] expresses his surprise that, standing as I do, holding the relations that I do to the President, I should have taken the course I have on this subject. That gentleman, perhaps, knows those relations better than I do. But the gentleman mistakes me, if he thinks that any intimations of the displeasure of the Executive shall terrify me from denouncing that course against which I warned him. I owe no responsibility to the President for words I utter here. I am responsible, and responsible alone, to that old and untiried Commonwealth which I have the honor, in part, to represent in this body. The gentleman has been pleased to allude to the armed neutrality. Could there be a better exemplification of it than my course here to-day? I have been fighting against the sub-Treasury and against the bank. I am still fighting against them, but with this advantage over my former position—that then they assailed me upon either hand, now they both approach me from the same side. He would still defend himself, let the attack come from what quarter it may. He was an armed neutral, and no vassal, and he begged the gentleman from New York to notice it.

Mr. WRIGHT, after a few observations not distinctly heard, said that his only purpose in rising was to refer to a single idea thrown out by the Senator from Virginia in the course of his remarks; and that was that his (Mr. W.'s) remarks were threatening the Senator with Executive power. In reference to that he must, of course, be judged by the Senate and audience. It might not be safe for him to judge himself. He could only say that nothing was further from his intention than to have given utterance to any idea of the kind. He could not believe that any expression of his was possibly susceptible of any such construction. He had spoken of the Senator's remarks as having disappointed him, standing in the relation he did to the President. He spoke in no tone of censure; and the Senator must be aware that he knew that the President had no power over him as a Senator from the proud Commonwealth of Virginia, and that it would have been both vain and foolish in him to utter such a thought. He could not believe it possible that any such construction could be put on anything that had fallen from him; and he rose for the purpose of saying that no such thing was intended. He did not intend to be personally unkind to him, and did not believe that his remarks could be so construed. He had nothing further to say than that, if the concluding remark of the Senator was intended to apply to him, he repelled and spurned it.

Mr. RIVES asked what concluding remark the gentleman referred to?

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman, on concluding, said "that he was no vassal of the President, and he begged the gentleman from New York to remember it."

Mr. RIVES said a few words in reply, which were not heard distinctly.

Mr. NILES remarked that the war, among neutrals, had become so warm, at least on one side, that it might be dangerous for him, being a quiet, peaceable man, to interfere, even for the purpose of moderating the fierceness of the conflict. He certainly felt obliged to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Rives] for introducing these resolutions; he desired, as much as the Senator, a full investigation of the conduct of the officers of the Treasury in the management of the finances. The inquiries were all very proper; at any rate, he had no objection to any of them, or any others which the Senator may choose to make. If there has been any illegal or improper connection between the Treasury and the Bank of the United States, or any other banks, he would be one of the last to justify it. He would not, however, imitate the Senator's example of condemning the Secretary first, and then inquiring into his conduct. This was not in accordance with his notions of justice and propriety, although, perhaps, it may be with those of this new school of politicians, belonging to the "armed neutrality."

Mr. N. said he should vote for the resolutions, and could assure the honorable Senator that he would have voted for them without the eloquent and very temperate speech by which they had been sustained. He thought well of the resolutions, and would not stop to inquire what the motives or object of the mover might be; it was to be presumed that they were purely patriotic, and having reference solely to the public interest. And he was sorry he could not say as much of the Senator's speech; but it did appear to him that that was not exactly in the right tone; it was a little too warm for a neutral, and especially as the occasion seems to have been sought by the Senator.

The substance of it also appeared to him to be somewhat objectionable. Resolutions are offered proposing certain inquiries touching the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury; and on the consideration of these resolutions the Senator makes a speech full of crimination, condemning the Secretary for the very act about which the resolution asks for information. It seemed to him that it would have been quite as candid and fair to have obtained the information first, and then to have predicated the accusations upon it.

But what have we witnessed? A resolution of inquiry is introduced, which is immediately changed into a bill of indictment against the Administration and all its supporters. And what is the proof by which the charges preferred in this bill of indictment are attempted to be sustained? Why, it is the declarations and accusations of the avowed and sworn enemies of the Administration; the statements and charges of the most reckless and depraved of the Opposition presses, whose vocation it is to falsify and misrepresent every act and measure of the Government, right or wrong. And first and foremost of this formidable array of witnesses is introduced a very important person, who has acted a conspicuous part in the seven years' war to which the Senator has alluded. This is no less a personage than Nicholas Biddle, one of the belligerent parties to this very war. Well, what does this witness say in support of the gentleman's bill of indictment? Why, he says that the war between the Government and the bank has ceased; that peace, or at least a truce, has taken place; that he has had a negotiation with the Government, and purchased in his bonds; and that the Government has treated him very fairly and honorably.

Now, sir, although I have no fault to find with this testimony, yet as the Senator boasted that this witness stood so high in reputation that he could not be impeached, he was disposed to offer a witness standing equally high to impeach him. The witness he had to offer was this same Nicholas Biddle, who, in his celebrated manifesto, issued on the 5th of April last, gave his testimony regarding this war. He said that it was a war carried on by the Government against the "credit system;" that both parties were in the field face to face; that it was a life and death struggle, a war of extermination, in which there could be no compromise or accommodation, but that one or the other must fall. Now, according to this witness last April, there could be no peace or truce between the Government and the bank, much less an alliance offensive and defensive, as the Senator intimates. If the assertions of Mr. Biddle at one time are in direct contradiction to his statements at another, according to the rules of testimony, he was a discredited witness, and his testimony must go for nothing.

Of the other witness, on which the Senator has relied to support his charges against the Administration, consisting of the Baltimore Chronicle and other Opposition presses, he was not disposed to speak. If the Senator looks to such sources for correct information concerning the acts of the executive officers, he was not disposed to follow him into that field. How long the Senator had been in the habit of judging of the measures of the Administration from information derived from such sources, Mr. N. could not say; but he believed the time was not distant when the Senator had as little confidence in the statements of these honest bank organs as he had himself.

This, Mr. President, is the testimony on which such serious charges are made against the Administration, and sustained with so much correctness and warmth. And not only have the past acts of the Executive and Secretary been condemned on intelligence derived from such sources; but the future and intended measures of the Administration are ascertained from the same honest channels of information. Looking at the Administration through such a medium, both to discover what it has done and what it intends to do, who can doubt that the Senator will form a most candid and impartial judgment of its measures and purposes?

Mr. N. said he did not propose to go into the various matters which had been introduced into this debate, or to notice the numerous charges and insinuations against the Administration which had been thrown out.

His principal object was to call attention to several positions which had been assumed. The first and most important was the declaration that the seven years' war was at an end; that the Government had not only given up the contest, but had been obliged to succumb to the bank, and had made a dishonorable peace, and even entered into an alliance, defensive and offensive, with the bank. He (Mr. N.) congratulated the Senate and the country on this highly important fact, about which he supposed there could now be no doubt. It was announced the other day by Mr. Biddle himself; but coming in rather a questionable shape, and connected with other marvelous statements of the doings of the bank, many doubted it. It is now, however, confirmed by the honorable Senator from Virginia; and by the mouth of two witnesses every fact shall be established. Surely, sir, it should be a subject of general rejoicing that this long controversy is closed; that this seven years' war is terminated; that peace again reigns in our borders. For several years past, and particularly during the extra and the last session of Congress, we heard little else from the other side of this Chamber, whether from the large or small division of the Opposition, but war speeches and panic speeches. The war of the Government upon the banks was held up to the country as the most alarming state of things; as having occasioned the prostration of credit, the derangement of the currency, the suspension of the banks, the ruin of commerce and the entire business of the country. Even our civil institutions, and the liberties of the country, were to be overthrown by this cruel and relentless war which the Government was waging against the banks. The most eloquent appeals were made to the people to arouse from their lethargy and interpose their mighty arm before it was too late, and save their dearest interests from destruction. The interest of the banks was the interest of the people, and a war upon the banks was a war upon the people—a war which affected every class and every interest, the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the capitalist and the laborer—all were suffering, languishing under the effects of this ruinous and destructive war upon the banks and the credit system.

This is the language, sir, which but a few months since was almost daily heard within these walls. Hostility to the banks and the credit system was the great and besetting sin of the Administration, which swallowed up all others. But what do we hear now from the same quarter? Why, sir, will it be believed when it goes forth to the country, that a Senator who was most zealous and constant in declaiming and repeating the charges of hostility to the banks, is now the first to arraign and condemn, unheard, the same Administration for having terminated a war which was declared to be so destructive to the best interests of the country—of having succumbed to the monster, and made a dishonorable peace, and formed a dangerous alliance with him?

What, sir, are we to think of this? Were gentlemen sincere? Did they really believe in the actual existence of a war, prosecuted by the Government against the banks and its ruinous consequences, which filled them with such fearful apprehensions, or were they attempting to hold up this bugbear to frighten the people, to alarm their imaginations, to exasperate their feelings, the more effectually to enlist them in the only war which had any real existence in fact—a war by the politicians, aided by the banks, upon the Administration and a majority of the people who sustained it.

Surely, sir, if the gentlemen believed in the existence of the bank war, of which they have had so much to say, and the evils of which they have portrayed in such glowing colors, they should be the first to rejoice at the return of peace—at a restoration of a good understanding between the Government and the banks.

These gentlemen of the armed neutrality appear to be very difficult to please. During the last two sessions, the whole burden of their complaints was the hostility of the Administration to the banks; and now they arraign the same Administration, pursuing the same general policy, for being too friendly to the banks, and for forming an alliance with Mr. Biddle's bank. But whether these neutrality politicians are pleased with this new aspect of things or not, it must be gratifying to all who have confided in their speeches and declarations heretofore, to learn that this great source of danger and mischief to all their interests—the bank war—is at an end.

Mr. N. said there was another point which seemed to be conceded in this debate, which he also thought a subject of just congratulation. It was, that the danger of a Treasury bank, which was so alarming at the last session, had entirely disappeared. The country had escaped that awful peril. We were then told that that "execrable measure," the independent Treasury, would result in a Treasury bank, springing from the revenues of the Government and the drafts and transfers of the Treasurer. The sub-Treasury plan has been in practical operation during the past year, and does not appear to have resulted in a Treasury bank. Instead of that, we are now told of an alliance between the Treasury and the Bank of the United States.

There was another subject of congratulation, which, if not conceded in the debate, was, he thought, fully established by what we have witnessed on this occasion. He alluded to the "half-way house." That was gone, demolished, and swept away with the bank war and the Treasury bank. Sir, it is gone; not a vestige of it remains; and its tenants made a timely retreat from it before its fall, and passed on to the end of the road in which they had started; and have now arrived at the marble palace, where they were, no doubt, kindly received by the old occupants, with the friendly salutation: "Gentlemen, we are happy to see you; will you please be seated, and make yourselves at home."

These changes were all important; he rejoiced at them, and did not doubt that the country would rejoice. We have got clear of the bank war, of the imminent danger of a Treasury bank, and of the half-way house, which was an obstacle on all sides; the coast now seemed to be pretty much clear. We have, however, it seems, an armed neutrality, a belligerent peace party, or neutrals who cooperate with one of the belligerents. Of the "armed neutrality," of which the Senator from Virginia seems to admit himself the head, he would say nothing, as he did not perhaps understand its true character. But he knew something of neutral politicians, whether armed or unarmed, he had watched the course of them for thirty years, and from the days of Aaron Burr to the present time, they had always been the same. The history of one was the history of all. He knew well what their neutrality was in its first, second, and third state. All deserters from the Democratic party at first assume the character of neutrals, or no-party men; and whilst in this transition state, which was sometimes a longer and sometimes a shorter period, they carry on a war against their old friends and old principles, under their old flag. This, sir, has been the course of neutral and no-party politicians in this country. Whilst maintaining the character of armed neutrals, they fight under a piratical flag; and at the end of six months or one year, they throw to the winds the Democratic banner, and take their station in the ranks of their former enemies; when often having, for some brief months, declaimed eloquently against party and party spirit, they become the most intolerant, malignant, and persecuting partisans the country has ever witnessed. For the truth of this statement, he appealed to the political history of the country; he appealed to existing facts. Look round these Halls, look into the State Legislatures, cast your eye over the whole country; take a view of recent alarming scenes which are now acting in one of the great States of this Union, and then say who are the most violent, unscrupulous, and reckless political partisans in the country; who push selfish party measures to the greatest extremes, breaking over the barriers of the Constitution and laws, and trampling right and justice under their feet. It will be found, sir, in almost every instance, that the bold, daring, and reckless politicians, are deserters from the popular cause, and at some short period, have declaimed eloquently against the abuses of party. Mr. N. said he spoke of general principles, but made no application of them; he passed no judgment upon the motives and purposes of any one; he presumed all here to be actuated by high and honorable motives.

The Senator from Virginia concluded with an eloquent appeal to the friends of the Administration to throw aside their groveling, selfish, party purposes, to break asunder the trammels of party, and elevate their views to the great interests of their country. This appeal, sir, under other circumstances, might have been commendable; it might have been worthy of the Senator, and honorable to the noble Commonwealth he represents. But under what circumstances was it made? It was the conclusion of a speech uncalled for by the occasion, intemperate in its tone, and throughout characterized by unfounded and unsupported charges and criminations against the Administration and all its supporters.

If a professed friend (said Mr. N.) should meet me in the street, and after abusing me with hard words, beat me over the head with his cane, and then say to me, "Sir, let us now be friends; these strifes and contentions not only render us unhappy, but they are annoying to the whole community; let us elevate our feelings above these low and base passions." In such a case, I should be a little inclined to doubt the sincerity of the eloquent appeal made to my more elevated feelings.

Who has betrayed any warmth of party feeling in this debate, or during the present session unless it be the Senator himself?

He speaks of the high and exalted considerations by which he is actuated, rising above the mists of party, and looking only to the great interests of the country. Of the Senator's motives, aims, and purposes, he had nothing to say; but he wished the gentleman to understand, that however pure, disinterested, or elevated they may be, they are not more so than those of the Senators to whom he addressed his appeal.

We are called on to abandon the ruinous sub-Treasury scheme, and are told that it has been condemned by the country. Is the Senator quite sure he is not mistaken? Occupying the position he does, at the head of an armed neutrality, he may not have been the most impartial observer of passing events. Sir, a greater mistake was never made. No impartial observer can have mistaken the elections of the past year. They have spoken a language which cannot well be misunderstood. The financial question has been before the country; it has been discussed, examined, and is becoming understood. The people have looked at it, not in its details, but at the great principle of the entire disconnection of the finances of the Government from those of the banks, who desire to use the public money for their own benefit, and they are satisfied that it is founded in right and justice. That is enough for them; they wish to look no further. Whether it will injure the banks or not, is of no consequence with them; if satisfied the measure is right and just, they desire to see it carried out. The mass of the people are honest, and they love justice above all things. The only difficulty has been that the subject was not sufficiently understood. That difficulty is passing away. The people now understand this question; they have examined it and decided upon it. It is no longer in the power of all the combined talents in these Halls, however great, to mystify the subject or hoodwink the people. They have considered it well, and the elections have announced their verdict; their voice has been heard from the mountains to the valleys, and from the lakes to the Atlantic. It is the voice of approbation. If this question could this day be fairly submitted to the direct action of the people, at least two thirds of the electors in the United States would be found in its favor. And yet we are called on to abandon the measure on the ground that it has been condemned by the people, and told that it is a mere party measure. To abandon it, sir, would be to betray our trusts; to betray the people; to disregard their known will; to trample upon their rights. Yet this is the way the Senator invokes us to elevate our minds above the low, selfish, and groveling purposes of party.

Mr. N. said he forbore to notice various other matters touched upon by the Senator, as his principal object in rising was to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the new positions which are assumed. Sir, the alarming evils which have so long threatened the ruin of the country, have suddenly disappeared, and that without any change of policy on the part of the Administration; for to regard the negotiation of a bond to the Bank of the United States, as constituting a change, would be trifling with the subject. The bank war, which had so long afflicted the country, bringing so many evils in its train, is at last terminated. The day of panics is gone, and we may now expect quiet and prosperity. The sub-Treasury bill is in practical operation and we have escaped that great and alarming peril—a Treasury bank. We have also got rid of the half-way house, and nothing now remains but the armed neutrality, and that ever pitiful theme of declamation, Executive influence. That, sir, still remains, and will remain as long as this Government endures. It has been, now is, and will continue to be, a subject about which many great, good, and just men will entertain apprehensions of danger to our institutions; and they will eloquently and earnestly warn the people against this danger. In his opinion, this was not the weak point in our political fortress; it was not the place where the first breach would be made. But whilst many honest and good men will point to this source of danger, and raise their warning voices against the increase of Executive power, there will at all times be other men who will declaim eloquently and earnestly against the abuses and the increase of Executive power, Executive patronage, and Executive influence, for other and far different motives and purposes.

After some further remarks from Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his gratification at the Senator from Virginia having introduced the resolution. He was anxious to have all the facts, and to probe the matter to the bottom, and to know what connection existed between the Government and the Bank of the United States. In the present state of things, he deemed it premature to offer any remarks on the course of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury; and he would, therefore, only assure the gentleman from Virginia that, if the Secretary had united himself with the bank beyond what the laws allowed, it should not be with his support. He was against all connection with the banks, even when sanctioned by, but certainly more against it without, law. The Senator from Virginia stated in his place that the Sub-Treasury was abandoned by the great body of the people of the country, and by this body, with the exception of a few members, in which he supposed the Senator included him. Now, the Senator was widely mistaken. If they might judge by the recent elections, the opinions in favor of the sub-Treasury were advancing, instead of going back. The elections in all the States turned upon the connection with the banks, and that connection taken in its extreme character, with the specie clause of the sub-Treasury bill, and the verdict had been in its favor. The gentleman was mistaken. The discussions of the extra session and the last had impressed ideas on the public mind which never could be eradicated. The gentleman referred to the late defalcations as an argument against the sub-Treasury. Why, the gentleman must know that they did not touch the subject of the sub-Treasury at all; they belonged wholly to the connection between the Government and the banks, and grew out of it.

Mr. C. then referred to the times when these defalcations took place, to show that they were in consequence of bank connection. He asked the Senator from Virginia if the defalcations which took place between 1830 and 1836 belonged to the sub-Treasury? Did they not belong to the pet bank system? In that, at least, the gentleman must agree with him. The next defalcation took place under the legislation of this Government, at the last session. The banks themselves broke the connection, by suspending payment, and caused the disastrous state of things that followed. They resumed payment, and the renewal of the resolution of 1816 restored the connection, so that a deep connection—and he said it with regret—now existed between the Government and the banks. So far from these defalcations operating against the Independent Treasury, it was the strongest argument in favor of it that they had taken place. He did not now intend to go further into this subject, but would postpone further remarks until the report of the Secretary of the Treasury should be received.

Mr. RIVES was happy to hear the explanation of the honorable Senator from South Carolina. He thought, however, that the defalcation did not attach to the system of bank deposits. He appealed to his candor, upon a review of his argument, whether it was a sound one. Were these moneys abstracted by the banks, or by the officers of the banks, or were they abstracted before they reached the banks, or before they had passed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States on the books of the banks? He held it to be impossible, under the deposit system, faithfully administered, that such defalcations should have taken place.

Mr. CALHOUN, after some remarks, referred to the opinion advanced by the Senator from Virginia, that the Government would lose nothing by the State banks. This, he said, remained to be seen, as there was yet a large amount due from them. But what, he asked, had we already lost? Had we not been compelled to borrow money and pay interest in consequence of their withholding the money of the Government in their hands; and had we not been compelled to disburse their depreciated notes to a large amount? Mr. C. estimated the loss to the Government, up to this time, in consequence of its connection with banks, at upwards of forty millions, and contended that the recent suspension of the banks had occasioned not only the loss to the Government of three or four millions, but the loss to the community at large, of from fifty to one hundred millions. The loss incurred by individuals was that of a molehill to a mountain, in comparison with the loss occasioned by a connection with banks.

The resolution was then agreed to; and
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 20, 1838.

Mr. WISE asked the consent of the House to permit him to proceed in his remarks upon the subject of the late defalcations; to which request objection being made.

Mr. W. asked for a suspension of the rules to enable him to proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon suspending the rules, and decided in the negative.

The presentation of petitions being in order,
Mr. ADAMS being entitled to the floor,

Mr. CUSHMAN asked the gentleman to give way to permit him to present to the House a report of Lieutenant George N. Hollins, of the United States Navy, surveyor of light-houses in the fifth light-house district of the United States, transmitted to him as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with a view to have it printed in connection with the report of the Fourth Auditor, heretofore presented; to which Mr. ADAMS consented; when Mr. C. presented said report, and order was taken accordingly.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. ADAMS then presented the petition from sundry laborers upon the public works in Washington city, praying remuneration for the loss of time caused by the action of this House at the last session.

Mr. A. said that he did not know why these laborers had been thus deprived of proper compensation. They were common laborers, dependent upon their labor alone for support, and the Commissioner of Public Buildings should have paid them every cent for this lost time. Mr. A. was going on to advocate the claims of the petitioners to compensation, when

Mr. CRARY called the gentleman to order, as he was going on to debate the merits of the question.

Mr. ADAMS said he merely made the remarks in justice to these poor men, and would ask for the reading of the petition; after which he asked that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings, though it was his opinion the House should now proceed to act upon the subject promptly.

Mr. LINCOLN said that the Committee on Public Buildings had already instructed him to report a joint resolution to pay the persons alluded to, and the object of his colleague would be attained by giving the direction to the memorial indicated.

The memorial was accordingly referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. ADAMS presented a petition from certain citizens of New Hampshire, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, &c., accompanied with a request to be heard in support thereof in person or by counsel. Mr. A. moved that the leave be granted to the petitioners.

The SPEAKER ruled that the request, as well as the balance of the memorial, fell under the operation of Mr. AHERN's fifth resolution, and must go on the table.

Mr. ADAMS took an appeal from this decision, and contended that the request of the petitioners to be heard was altogether a different thing from the prayer of the body of the petition, and that the former did not come within the operation of the order referred to. Mr. A. called for the yeas and nays upon the appeal; which were ordered.

Mr. CUSHMAN at first moved to lay the appeal on the table; but it appearing to be the general wish on the part of the House to take the question directly on the appeal, he withdrew the motion.

Mr. MERCER remarked that the petition itself would of course be, or now was, laid on the table; and to grant leave to petitioners to be heard on a matter that the House had laid on the table would be a solecism.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, would ask the gentleman if the petition itself, on which the memorialists asked to be heard, did not pray for the abolition of slavery, and whether the gentleman desired that they should come here to advocate that question?

The question on the appeal was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 180, nays 8; as follows:

AS FOLLOWS:

YFAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Ayrigg, Banks, Beatty, Breeds, Beirne, Bell, Ricknell, Birdsall, Roon, Briggs, Broadhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleg, William B. White, John White, Whittlescy, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, Worthington, and Yell.—180.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, William B. Calhoun, Dartington, Davies, Evans, Potts, Ridgway, and Tillinghast—8.

So the decision of the Chair was affirmed by the House.

Mr. WISE desired the Clerk to note the fact that he had refused to vote; and he further desired him henceforward never to call his name on any vote on the subject of abolition.

Mr. ADAMS presented a petition remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union, and moved its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was laid on the table, without a division.

The same disposition was made of the other petitions on this subject.

Mr. ADAMS presented a memorial praying Congress to open and establish international relations with the Republic of Hayti, and moved its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to consider and report thereon.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for a division of the question.

Mr. ADAMS said he had moved the instructions because the chairman of that committee [Mr. Howard] had stated that petitions had heretofore been referred to that committee, and no action had ensued upon them; and also because he had thrown out an intimation that, if referred to that committee again, nothing more would be heard of them.

Mr. HOWARD said that was an insinuation the gentleman had no right to make.

Mr. ADAMS said he had a right to make it, for the gentleman's language had amounted to nothing short of a distinct pledge.

Mr. HAYNES called the gentleman to order, for debating the petition on the day of its presentation.

The SPEAKER said it must lie over one day, under the rule, if it gave rise to debate.

Mr. ADAMS said he had no desire to debate it, but merely to assign a reason for moving the instructions.

The SPEAKER. That is debating the petition.

Mr. ADAMS. Well, then, having stated to this House, and to the country, and to the petitioners that—

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose to order on the ground that the petition had been ordered to lie over till to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMS said he had risen to withdraw the instructions, for he feared that the lying over till to-morrow would be equivalent to its postponement till the end of the session.

The instructions being withdrawn, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. A. subsequently presented another petition on the same subject, and moved the instructions, stating his intention of debating the subject, and it was ordered to lie over.

Mr. A. also presented a large number of petitions from various States (including one or two from Ohio county, Virginia,) praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, remonstrating against the admission of any new slaveholding State, against the annexation of Texas, for international relations with Hayti, &c. The abolition petitions were laid on the table under Mr. Atherton's resolution, and the others were disposed of as stated above.

Mr. CUSHING, for the purpose, he said, of economizing the time of the House, would present, to-day, but one of the many abolition petitions intrusted to his charge, and would postpone the others to a future day.

Mr. C. availed himself of that opportunity to pronounce the resolution ordering those petitions on the table to be unconstitutional, to protest against it, and asked that his protest might be entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER ruled it to be out of order. Petitions and memorials were then further presented by Messrs. TILLINGHAST and CRANSTON, of Rhode Island.

Messrs. TOUCEY, WHITTLESEY, HALEY, and HOLT, of Connecticut.

[Mr. HALEY presented the petition of Gilbert Sprague Fisk, praying for a pension for services rendered and wounds received in the battle at Stonington, in the late war with Great Britain. Also, the petition of Samuel Edgecomb, praying

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith additional letters and documents embraced in the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 20, 1835.

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also the following:

To the House of Representatives:

An important difference of opinion having arisen concerning the construction of an act of Congress making a grant of land to the State of Indiana, and in which she feels a deep interest, I deem it proper to submit all the material facts to your consideration, with a view to procure such additional legislation as the facts of the case may appear to render proper.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the documents annexed from the General Land Office, will disclose all the circumstances deemed material in relation to the subject, and are herewith presented.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 20, 1838.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a statement in relation to the execution of the Chickasaw treaty of 1834; which was laid on the table.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to James Tylar.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to issue a patent to Oliver Perrin and John W. Faunce, on their application filed in the Patent Office on the 1st of September, 1834, and that the accompanying papers be referred to said committee.

On motion of Mr. SLADE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to the volunteers who repaired to Plattsburg on the invasion by the British forces, in September, 1814, and that all the papers on file relating to that subject be referred to said committee.

On motion of Mr. JENIFER, it was Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged therefrom, and that so much of the President's message as relates to the tobacco trade with foreign nations be referred to a select committee.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying John Houswright, a contractor upon mail route No. 1865, in Virginia, for expenses incurred by a change in the arrival and departure of the mails on that route, made after the contract was made and the commencement of his services.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the improvement of the navigation of the Apalachicola river.

On motion of Mr. MAY, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to transmit to this House the papers in relation to the claim of Richard L. Barre to fractional section four, in township four north, in range nine west, of the fourth principal meridian in Illinois.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM, of Indiana, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from the Pleasant Gardens, in Burke county, North Carolina, by Turkey Cove, Grassy Creek, and Rock Creek, to Jonesboro, in Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. YELL, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of amending the act of the 9th of July, 1836, so as to authorize the Secretary of War, if, in his opinion, the defense of the frontiers demand it, to continue the occupation of Fort Gibson, and to construct the road on or near the western boundary line, passing within the limits of the State of Arkansas, if the situation of the country and the good of the service require it.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of creating an additional land district in the northwestern part of the State of Missouri, so as to embrace within the limits of said land district what is usually called the Platt county, recently annexed to said State.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the fees allowed by law to the clerks, marshals, and district attorneys of the United States courts for the State of Louisiana, so as to correspond with the fees allowed for similar services in the State courts of said State.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, it was

Resolved, That the case of James B. Brice, referred at the late session of Congress to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, be again referred to the said committee.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the payment for the horses and equipages which have been turned over to the officers of the United States by mounted volunteers who served in Florida.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of granting to all the settlers that may have heretofore settled, or may hereafter settle, on the public lands, preemption rights to one quarter section of said land, according to the provisions of an act, approved June 22, 1838, entitled "An act to grant preemption rights to settlers on the public lands."

The resolution having been read, Mr. CHAPMAN submitted the following, as a substitute:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the preemption laws so as—

1. To permit settlers to enter timbered lands to make and support their farms on the prairie.

2. To include young men who had farms, but were not housekeepers.

3. Those whose settlements were made prior to the surveying of the lands whereon such settlements were made, and who by subsequent surveys are made to occupy different quarter sections than those upon which their farms are situated.

4. Those whose settlements were made within the four months specified in said law.

5. Those whose settlements were made subsequent to the passage of the said law, and so as to require six months' notice of the sale of public lands.

That said committee also inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sub-division of the mineral lands into lots corresponding in size with lots laid out under the mining, and for the sale thereof to the claimants. That said committee also inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a commissioner to adjust the title to said lots.

On motion, the House adjourned.

A bill to authorize the sale to the Mississippi and Alabama Railroad Company a certain portion of the public land.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, on leave, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to prevent the interference of certain public officers in elections; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice; and referred:

A bill for the relief of Jane Waller;
A bill for the relief of Benjamin Parsons;
A bill for the relief of James H. Ralston;
A bill for the relief of Jacob Hanks;
A bill for the relief of Dennis Quinlevan;
A bill for the relief of Charles A. Dodd;
A bill for the relief of William Bennett;
A bill for the relief of John L. Scott;
A bill for the relief of John Richey;
A bill for the relief of David McNair;
A bill for the relief of Samuel Ferguson; and
A bill to establish a pension agency at Springfield, in the State Illinois.

Mr. DAVIS, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the Nantucket Steamboat Company; also a bill for the relief of Elijah Eldridge; which were severally read twice and referred.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the House, making appropriations in part for the support of Government for the year 1838-39. The question being on the amendment of Mr. CRITTENDEN to the amendment of Mr. WALL—the latter being for the insertion of an appropriation of $250,000 to pay the pensions of certain widows of revolutionary soldiers married between 1783 and 1794, provided for by the act of the last session, and the former being for the repeal of said act after the 4th of March next.

Mr. DAVIS hoped his friend from Kentucky would withdraw his amendment; and if the subject of repealing this act was to be agitated, why let it be so at a more appropriate period.

Mr. KING observed that he should be pleased to see the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky withdrawn, provided the example was followed by the Senator from New Jersey, in withdrawing his amendment. The last was calculated to embarrass this appropriation bill, and if persevered in, he would unquestionably give his vote to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. He hoped the whole subject of both amendments would come up in a separate bill, and that the Senator from New Jersey would see the propriety of withdrawing his amendment, and suffering the bill to pass. He should go as far as anybody to redeem the public faith; he knew that the Government owed these widows the money, and he was willing to provide for its payment in a proper way. But as this amendment was only calculated to embarrass the bill under consideration, he hoped the gentleman would withdraw it.

Mr. WALL would be very happy to gratify his friend from Alabama, but in the present instance he must decline doing so. This is an appropriation bill to meet exigencies caused by enactments of Congress. The amendment was intended to provide for the requisitions of a law passed at the last session, for which we failed to make an appropriation. He thought that by failing to provide the means at the last session, it became our duty, at as early a moment as possible, to make this appropriation. He could not see the impropriety of passing this appropriation now, which the honorable Senator from Alabama admits must be made at some period.

Mr. NILES was much pleased with the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, and regretted that his friend from New Jersey did not take the same view of the matter. He was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN], as well as the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey; for the probability was, that if the former was defeated it would also defeat the latter. What he wished to call the attention of the Senate to was the importance of the amendment introduced by the Senator from New Jersey—a matter of too much importance to be brought forward in this incidental way.

Mr. CALIHOUN said he would be glad if the honorable Senator from New Jersey would acquiesce in the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama. He thought that the Committee on Pensions should have time to look into the matter for which this appropriation was asked; that they should report the reasons why these names were placed on the pension list. Can any man believe that these one thousand names on the list are those of widows married between 1783 and 1794, and all applicants in less than a year? He hoped that the Senator from New Jersey, who was disposed to do justice on this, as on all other subjects, would see the propriety of acquiescing in the course indicated by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said that he had been solicited by his friends to withdraw this amendment, and that he should accordingly do so. As to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, his opinion was that it was entirely irregular, and that it ought to be disapproved of by every member of the Senate. Here was a bill coming from the other House, to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government, and if the gentleman from New Jersey can delay it by a proposition to carry through his favorite measure, why every member of the Senate, who has a favorite measure, can, with equal justice, tack it to an important appropriation bill, and place members under the necessity of defeating that bill if they vote against it. He should unhesitatingly vote against this amendment, which was highly improper for this bill. He admitted that his amendment was not suited to the bill, but he thought it very proper for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WALL said that he could not, with his views of the duty he owed to himself and his constituents, consent to withdraw his amendment. He protested, however, against his being held responsible for the wide range the debate had taken.

Mr. DAVIS addressed the Senate at length in reply to the remarks of Mr. STRANGE, on Monday last.

After some further debate, in which Messrs. DAVIS, STRANGE, and BROWN participated,

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. WALL, and there were—yeas 12, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Pierce, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Swift, Wall, and Williams of Maine—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Rives, Robinson, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wright, and Young—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 21, 1838.

Mr. CUSHING moved to amend the Journal as follows. Insert therein the following words:

Mr. CUSHING presented a petition from Joseph Young and others, of Salisbury, in the State of Massachusetts; which was laid on the table under the resolution of the House of the 12th of December last; and on presenting the same, Mr. CUSHING protested that, in submitting to the application of said rule to this petition, he yielded not to right but to power, conceiving said resolution not to be constitutional, and therefore in itself purely null and void; which protest he moved to be entered on the Journal, but which motion the Speaker decided to be out of order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired if this motion should be rejected, whether the subject-matter, or rather the gentleman's protest, would not still go on the Journal? and he would further inquire if there was no way of avoiding it? for this thing was constantly growing upon them, and should be put a stop to.

The SPEAKER replied that the whole would go on the Journal of this day's proceedings.

Mr. DROMGOOLE remarked that these motions were a pretext, a mere device. A gentleman who may be displeased with the rules of the House, or the decision of the Speaker of the House, can, at this rate, come the next morning and enter on the Journal that which the House refused to have entered. He hoped, therefore, the House would refuse to entertain the proposition.

Mr. CUSHING begged leave to suggest that this was no more a pretext or device than any other motion, and the House frequently entertained such motions, and he had made it according to the established rules of the House, whether they were erroneous in practice or not.

Mr. HOWARD concurred entirely with the gentleman from Virginia, that, if this motion was entered upon the Journal of to-day, so that it appeared on the Journal of to-morrow, the decision of the House would be thereby overruled. He hoped to-morrow the gentleman would move to strike it from the Journal, for it ought not to be placed there; for the House would perceive that if any member moved to amend the Journal by inserting his protest, however that motion might be decided, the protest would still go on the Journal only one day after the original request by this motion to correct the record, and next they would be called upon to enter speeches upon it.

Mr. ADAMS apprehended something more was necessary for the gentlemen than merely a motion to strike, because, as that motion must necessarily go on the Journal, so would the motion proposed to be struck out; for the Journal is, or ought to be, an entry of all the facts that occurred in their proceedings. This motion was the only remedy the minority had against the majority. He hoped this motion would go on the Journal, as it ought to.

Mr. DROMGOOLE would take issue with the gentleman, that these motions ought to go on the Journal. The Speaker decided the gentleman's [Mr. CUSHING's] motion to be out of order, the House acquiesced in it, and Mr. D. would leave it to the House to decide if the same motion ought to go on the Journal in another mode. He was aware of the difficulty, that the motion would go on the Journal, but it appeared to him that the House ought to devise some mode to avoid the recurrence of this abuse. By the present practice, gentlemen might get up one day, and give us a long tirade about what they pleased, all out of order, and next day place on the Journal what was pronounced out of order the day before. It was due to the country and due to their own character as a body, that some mode should be adopted to obviate this trifling with the House.

Mr. WISE said, as they were about to enter into an argument on expunging, he should go with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] The Journal ought to be a record of facts, and of all facts. This he would ask, that if you move to expunge the Journal, adopt the Bentonian practice, where will you find the pen in this House that will draw the black lines round it. Mr. W. moved the previous question; which was carried.

Mr. GRANT demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BELL inquired if it was proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts to enter his protest on the Journal.

The SPEAKER said it was.

Mr. EVANS inquired if the gentleman yesterday, on making his motion, had sent his protest to the Chair?

The SPEAKER replied that he did not.

The question was then taken; and decided in the negative—yeas 14, nays 174; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Borden, William B. Calhoun, Cushing, Davies, Richard Fletcher, Giddings, Hastings, Lincoln, Calvary Morris, Potts, Robinson, Saltonstall, and Tillinghast—14.

NAYS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Byrum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Clark, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Crabb, Craig, Cray, Cranston, Crockett, Cushman, Darlington, Dawson, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Goode, Grant, Grandland, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Griffitt, Halsey, Hall, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kennedy, Klingsmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Miller, Mitchell, Montgomery, Morgan, Matthias Morris, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Pennybacker, Pettrikin, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Kariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Rives, Rumsey, Russell, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Swearingen, Tallantire, Taylor, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Weeks, John White, Whittelsey, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Worthington, Yell, and Yorke—174.

So the motion of Mr. CUSHING was decided in the negative.

Mr. MALLORY, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which lies over one day under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform this House what measures, if any, had been taken to carry into effect the act of 1836, making an appropriation for the selection of sites, and the erection of marine barracks, at Charleston, Gosport, and Pensacola.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then rose and said, that as they had got through with all the petitions yesterday, he hoped the House would indulge him with an opportunity of reporting four important bills from the Committee of Ways and Means. He stated further, that he had no wish to interfere with the motion in relation to the late defalcations.

Mr. WISE expressed his anxiety to go on with his remarks on that subject; but he would not object to the request of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MERCER wished the motion to embrace all the committees.

Mr. CAMBRELENG so modified it; but

Mr. WISE objected; whereupon Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CHAMBERS remarked that they had consumed more time already than would have been necessary to report from half the committees, if the gentleman from Virginia had not interposed his objection.

The motion prevailed, and the committees were called in their order for reports.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee of Elections, to which had been referred the subject of the contested seat of the Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, made a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That J. D. Doty is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from Wisconsin Territory, and that John W. Jones is not entitled to the seat.

The report having been read,

Mr. BUCHANAN moved that it be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Thursday next, and printed.

Mr. BRONSON moved the special order, which Mr. B. accepted as a modification; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Way and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Indians.

Mr. C. also reported a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1839.

Mr. C. also reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year 1839.

Mr. C. also reported a bill more effectually to prevent frauds in the collection, keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, and to punish public defaulters.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Griffith Coombe and John P. Ingle, trustees of the brick Capitol.

Also, a bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, jr.

Also, a bill for the relief of Philip Marshall, and the legal representatives of John Marshall, deceased.

Mr. C. also made adverse reports on the cases of Thomas Rogers, executor of Charles Binns, deceased, and Archange Lacroix.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Henry Hull, asking compensation for difference of exchange and depreciated currency which was repaid and advanced by him as consul at San Salvador.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the House bill No. 96, being a bill for the reorganization of the Treasury Department, and the bill No. 472, being the bill to define the number, compensation, and duties of officers of the customs, be reprinted, and laid on the table of the House; and that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce give notice to the House that he will, on Wednesday next, ask it to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider said bills.

Mr. CASEY, when the Committee on Public Lands was called, rose and stated that he understood from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that, in order to a right understanding of that document, it was necessary that the maps, plans, and diagrams, accompanying his annual report, should be printed with it; and Mr. C. now made a motion to that effect; which was agreed to.

Mr. EWING then submitted a similar motion in relation to a map accompanying the President's message of yesterday on the subject of the Wabash and Erie canal; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the following:

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Barnes, deceased;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Nathan Lamme, deceased;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Tarpley White;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Thomas Cooke, deceased;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James Burton, deceased;

A bill for the relief of Roger Stayner, a captain in the army of the Revolution;

A bill to authorize the payment of seven years' half pay on account of the revolutionary services of Edward Wade;

A bill to authorize the same on account of similar services of William Gregory; and

A similar bill on account of the services of James Conway.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Levi Chadwick.

On motion of Mr. LEADBETTER, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD also reported the following:

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel Francis Vigo;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Lieutenant Colonel William Fountain, deceased;

A bill to authorize the issuing of land warrants in certain cases; and

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Lathrop Allen, deceased.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Wishart.

Also, a bill for the relief of the heirs of P. Thornton.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD, from the same committee, reported the following:

A bill to authorize the payment of seven years' half pay on account of the revolutionary services of Francis Eppes, deceased;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain James Pervis, deceased; and

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Dr. Charles Taylor, deceased.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported the following:

A bill for the relief of Solomon Prewett;

A bill for the relief of John England;

A bill for the relief of Jacob Baugh;

A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Jones and others; and

A bill for the relief of Oliver Peck.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported the following:

A bill granting a pension to Susanna Roe; and

A bill restoring the name of John Davis to the pension list.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Elizabeth Durant.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of the widow of Captain James Hunter.

Also, a bill for the relief of Fielding Pratt.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill giving the assent of Congress to the supplementary act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, and moved its engrossment.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved its commitment to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERCER insisted that that would defeat the bill, which did not require commitment, and had already twice passed the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN said it had become a matter of some consequence to the country to know how these charters were framed, and particularly to provide some stipulation to compel this company to carry the mail of the United States at a fair rate of compensation. These companies, by their extortion, were now going on to absorb the whole revenue of the Post Office Department; and wherever Congress had the power, whenever these companies came here to ask for favors, he wished to compel them to take a fair price for their services. Moreover, he was at a loss to see why these companies should always have precedence over all other claimants. He must insist on his motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, remarked that if the gentleman had amendments to offer, he could do it now.

Mr. HAYNES said that there were some very important provisions contained in this bill. A reference was made in it to different acts of the Virginia Legislature, and how, without further examination, could they know what those acts were? Besides, there were many less important bills than this sent to the Committee of the Whole. He was told this bill had passed this House several times, but that made no difference with him; all he could say was, that he knew nothing of those laws of Virginia, or the extent and nature of the privileges granted to this company, but the reasons were strong enough with him to induce him to vote for the commitment of the bill.

Mr. MERCER would inform the gentleman from Georgia that this bill had not only passed the House before, after a full discussion, but the gentleman himself was here at the time. He could assure him that when the bill came up to-morrow, he would cheerfully listen to the gentleman's argument. The object of his present motion was simply to put the bill in such a position as to secure action upon it this session.

Mr. TILLINGHAST could assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the bill had undergone the fullest examination in the committee reporting it, and the fullest discussion on its previous passage.

Mr. POPE said no necessity for committing this bill, for all it proposed was to give the company leave to construct their road through a few miles of this District. It took no money out of the Treasury, nor granted any extra privileges.

Mr. PETRIKIN replied, that small as this matter appeared in the eyes of some gentlemen, let but an effort be made to amend the bill so as to deprive the company of the power of charging more than a fair price for carrying the mail, and these very gentlemen will immediately raise a boisterous hue and cry about their corporate rights. Mr. P. reiterated his statement in relation to the extortion of railroad companies.

After a few further remarks from Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, the motion to commit was disagreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a joint resolution authorizing an examination and payment of the claims of the workmen upon the public buildings; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

SAMUEL SWARTWOUT.

Mr. WISE then asked leave to proceed with his remarks on the subject of Samuel Swartwout's defalcation.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped there would be no objection.

Mr. PETRIKIN persisting, Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rules; which prevailed.

The question was on the following resolution, moved some days since by Mr. CAMBRELENG:

Resolved, That so much of the communication of the President of the United States of the 8th of December, 1838, as relates to the default of Samuel Swartwout, be referred to a select committee; and that so much as relates to the adoption of further measures for increasing the public security against similar defalcations be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, requested his colleague to give way to allow him to lay on the table an amendment he designed to offer as soon as he could obtain the floor.

Mr. WISE giving way,

Mr. GARLAND sent to the table the following amendment, giving notice he would offer it hereafter:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the defalcation of Samuel Swartwout, late collector at New York, be referred to a select committee of nine members, to be chosen by ballot; and that said committee do further inquire into the alleged defalcation of William M. Price, late district attorney of the same city; and into any other defalcations or abuses in reference to the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public money.

That said committee have power to send for persons and papers; that they report all facts connected with such defalcation, which they may deem pertinent; and what further legislation, if any, may be necessary to prevent the same in future.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he would accept this as a modification, except that part of it which related to the mode of choosing the committee.

Mr. WISE then proceeded with his remarks, going into a general review of the proceedings on the former select committee of investigation, of which he was chairman; and went on to show that every allegation he had made against the abuses and corruptions of this Administration had been sustained. He concluded his remarks about half past eight o'clock, when

Mr. CUSHMAN obtained the floor; and, on his motion, the House adjourned.

SELECT COMMITTEES.

Select Committee on the memorial of the State of Georgia for the payment of a certificate of revolutionary debt.—Messrs. DAWSON, POTTER, AYCRIFF, HUNTER of Virginia, and SOUTHWATE.

On the memorial of the heirs of J. Rumsey.—Messrs. UNDERWOOD, HAWES, LEWIS, JENIFER, HOLT, MILLER, and BOON.

On the tobacco trade.—Messrs. JENIFER, COLES, SHIELDS, HOWARD, HARRISON, SERGEANT, LEADBETTER, UNDERWOOD, and JOHNSON, of Louisiana.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 22, 1838.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Treasury Department, in compliance with the provisions of the act of March 2, 1831, for the relief of sundry insolvent debtors of the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

He also communicated a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, relative to the quantity of unsold lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of William Hunt, James F. Ouis, Erastus Brooks, William Elwyn Moore, E. Kingman, and William H. Witman, stating that they are several reporters of congressional proceedings for the Baltimore American, New York Express, Ohio Statesman, Georgia Journal, Southern Patriot, Charleston Courier, Mobile Register, Lancaster Intelligencer, and that by the rule of the Senate they are deprived of the opportunity and privilege of obtaining information of congressional proceedings for their respective papers; that the provision of the Senate exclusively furnishing the facilities they ask to city reporters, does not furnish the people of the country with full reports of what takes place until several days after the date of such transactions, whereas it is the duty and purpose of the abovenamed reporters to transmit such intelligence by each day's mail; and praying that the Senate may assign them such seats on the floor, or in the galleries, as may enable them to discharge their duties to those whose agents they are. The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Contingent Fund.

The PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the only child of Lieutenant Nathaniel Fanning; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of Chauncey Hall, praying the patronage of Congress for a valuable discovery; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the presentment of the grand jury of the district court held at Columbia, South Carolina, complaining of the low compensation made to this district attorney, the jurors, and witnesses attending said court; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KING, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to grant to States and incorporated companies engaged in the construction of roads and canals the right of way through the public lands of the United States.

Mr. LYON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of J. and W. Berson and others; which was read twice, and referred.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, gave notice that he would to-morrow introduce a bill to explain and amend the act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust titles to lands under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the relinquishment of the 16th sections granted for the use of schools, and the location of other lands in lieu thereof.

Mr. ROBINSON gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to establish a land office at Peoria, in Illinois.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. TIPTON offered the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an agency for the payment of Pensions at Indianapolis, Indiana.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate such information as may be in his possession, in reference to the defense of the frontier of the State of Maine, and the number of troops now employed within the State, and the posts at which they are stationed.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that the House had passed a joint resolution for the appointment of a committee on Enrolled Bills, and that Messrs. YELL and NOYES had been appointed as the committee on their part; in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate; whereupon,

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Senate concur in the resolution, and that the President appoint the committee on the part of the Senate.

The motion having been agreed to, Messrs. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, and FOSTER, were appointed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which,

The Senate adjourned to Wednesday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 22, 1838.

The first business in order was the motion of Mr. ADAMS to refer a petition presented by him a day or two since, praying the establishment of international relations with Hayti, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to consider and report thereon.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, on the same occasion, having called for a division of the question, it was now taken on the motion of reference, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

The petition having been thus referred, the question recurred on the instructions.

Mr. ADAMS reiterated what he had before stated as a reason for moving thus to instruct the Committee on Foreign Relations, viz: the declaration from the chairman thereof, [Mr. HOWARD,] that if these petitions were sent to that committee, nothing more would be heard of them. Mr. A. contended that this was a case peculiarly demanding the serious consideration of that committee; and as he was proceeding to discuss the subject of abolition petitions, and the manner they were disposed of by the House—

The SPEAKER called to order.

Mr. ADAMS was again proceeding in the same strain, when he was again called to order by the Chair. As Mr. A. was again about to proceed—

Mr. BYNUM said if the gentleman was thus suffered to go on, he hoped some gentleman of the slaveholding portion of the House would be permitted to answer him.

Mr. ADAMS. I hope so, sir. After a pause: only open your mouths, gentlemen; that is all I ask, and you may answer as much as you please.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. BYNUM. I object to the gentleman's proceeding, unless by special leave of the House. If we have rules, we may as well abide by them; if not, we had better burn them.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved that the gentleman have leave to proceed; on which motion

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BRIGGS. My motion is, that the gentleman have leave to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. Of course. That is the parliamentary form.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Reman Allan, Anderson, Andrews, Birdsell, Boud, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Casey, Chambers, Childs, Clark, Cleveland, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Glascock, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kennedy, Lincoln, Loomis, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Mitchell, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Peck, Pickens, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Raiden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stanley, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Taylor, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Vanderveer, Albert S. White, John White, Whittelsey, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Boon, Bynum, John Calhoun, John Campbell, Chapman, Coles, Connor, Cray, Crockett, Cushman, Duncan, Farrington, Griffin, Hamer, Harrison, Haynes, Hopkins, Robert M. T. Hunter, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Noble, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Peirkin, John H. Prentiss, Shepler, Swearingen, Titus, Turney, Wagener, and Webster—47.

Mr. ADAMS, when his name was called, said he desired to be excused from voting, and his name was passed over.

So the leave asked was granted.

Mr. ADAMS then went on to contend that the Committee on Foreign Affairs were bound either to report on the merits of the petitions sent to them, or to assign the reasons why they did not deem it expedient to report one way or the other. It was a novel pretension set up by that committee, that they were not obliged to consider, report, or even look into petitions and resolutions of State Legislatures, nor to account to the House why they refused to perform the duty intrusted to them. It was an arbitrary assumption of power by the committee, and not respectful to the House, which committed such subjects to them, because they thereby deprived the House of the opportunity of considering them itself. He designated this course of conduct as one of the devices to abridge and suppress the right of petition. It was for this reason he had moved the instructions, so as to compel that committee to report on the petition, or their reasons for not reporting. He did not presume that he should be replied to, as he had no doubt the previous question would be sprung; but, if any response was made, he supposed it would be as to the motives of the petitioners. This, however, was an assumption of inference on the part of the House, which, if carried out, would go to destroy the right of petition altogether, except so far as it pleased the will of the majority. This was an assumption of arbitrary power of the most detestable character.

Mr. A. then adverted to the question of abolition, and in the course of his remarks he said that the great men of the Revolution were Abolitionists, George Washington among them; and if any man dared to deny that he was, he would prove it.

The SPEAKER called to order.

Mr. WISE. I deny it thoroughly.

Mr. ADAMS. I thank the gentleman for his denial. I will prove it. By his last will and testament, George Washington emancipated all his slaves.

Mr. WISE. Because he had no children.

The SPEAKER again interposed, and said this discussion was entirely out of order.

Mr. ADAMS. Then, I take the position that George Washington was an Abolitionist, in the most extensive sense of the term—

The SPEAKER again interposed.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the gentleman deny that Thomas Jefferson was an Abolitionist?

The SPEAKER here interposed; but

Mr. WISE answered—Yes, I do.

Mr. ADAMS proceeded, by saying that every man in the country had a perfect right to be an Abolitionist, for he disobeyed no law thereby.

The SPEAKER admonished Mr. A. again that he was entirely out of order in this mode of discussion.

Mr. ADAMS then proceeded to reply to the remarks of Mr. LEGARE made some days ago on the power of the House to reject petitions.

Mr. BOULDIN said, as his vote on this occasion would be different, both in regard to the party with whom he generally acted, and had no reason to doubt with whom he should continue to act, and also in regard to the section of country in which he lived, from what might be expected of him, and more especially as some of his former votes upon the subject of these petitions had differed upon different occasions, at least so they would apparently seem, though he had always voted to the best of his judgment, and with a view to the peace and harmony of the country, he begged leave now to state one or two reasons why he should vote for the reference of this petition.

The SPEAKER reminded Mr. B. that the petition had already been referred.

Mr. BOULDIN was more anxious about the reference; but still, he was anxious about the instructions. At a very early period in this controversy, some two or three years ago, he then expressed his willingness to give some answer, one way or the other, to these abolition papers; but he was told by some of his friends that it would operate as a firebrand, and increase the number of the Abolitionists. He yielded to the suggestion, and voted accordingly from time to time, though at different times he had given votes somewhat different, obeying therein the dictates of his own judgment.

The SPEAKER remarked that that subject was not now under consideration.

Mr. BOULDIN said if the Chair would give him only about one tenth the latitude allowed to the gentleman from Massachusetts, he could get out all he wanted.

The SPEAKER said that remarks made out of order could not be replied to in order. The gentleman from Massachusetts had been arrested in his remarks whenever they transgressed the proper limit.

Mr. BOULDIN. If the Chair succeeds no better with me than with the gentleman from Massachusetts—

The SPEAKER. The subject of abolition is not in order.

Mr. BOULDIN. I was going on to explain why it was that I meant to vote for the gentleman's motion, and to give reasons that are satisfactory to myself; and at the same time I wish to satisfy those to whom I address them that they are good reasons. If I am not at liberty to do this, I am not willing to insist upon proceeding out of order. I will ask the Chair if I am not at liberty to state that the reason why I will vote for the gentleman's proposition is, that the reference of the petition and its consideration will be the means of contributing to peace, happiness, and security, while the refusal to do so will produce confusion and civil discord? Are these reasons in order or not?

The SPEAKER stated the question was on the instructions, and not on the reference.

Mr. BOULDIN understood that perfectly well, and he also understood why he meant to vote for them. The reason was, that the considering of the subject by the committee, and answering it one way or the other, would give more peace, happiness, and security to the country; while the refusal to answer would produce opposite results. That was his principal reason; and he wished to show why it was, also, that, at this time, he would give that vote, while at another time he had given an apparently different vote.

Mr. B. would ask, why not give these instructions to that committee? Had not referring before, and reporting, had a good effect? Had it not produced peace and harmony almost throughout the country? Had the refusal to do so done this? Had it diminished the applications here? On the contrary, had it not increased them? He would refer this paper and the instructions, because the refusal to refer, and the refusal to report, in his judgment—he would not impugn the motives or judgments of others—had produced no other effect than he had described. He was for referring it, and for requiring an answer, because he was of opinion that the refusal to answer would produce the effect of misrepresenting the South, that she would not let the North be heard.

The SPEAKER again arrested Mr. B. for wandering from the point.

Mr. BOULDIN did not mean to be out of order, and, with due deference to the Chair, he was at a loss to perceive that he was.

The SPEAKER ruled otherwise.

Mr. BOULDIN would submit, then; but still he was satisfied that he had a right to present such reasons as would induce him to vote for the gentleman's proposition, whether they were so to the Speaker or not. If, however, he might be permitted to finish the sentence he commenced, he would sit down. It is this: That by these inferences, drawn from this course, northern people are made to believe that southern people wish to stop their mouths, and this he did not hold to be true. And, by the same inferences, southern people are made to believe that northern people are preparing to take up arms and march in battle array to emancipate their slaves, and neither did he believe this. He hated this entanglement about rules, special technicalities as they might be termed; and if we were to go to war, let us, said he, go to it about something tangible, and not about constructions of the rule of the House. Let us, at least, know what we are going to be set by the ears about. He would only add, in conclusion, that, by such misrepresentations and mischief-making as he had referred to, the North and the South may be made to hate each other to that extent that neither love nor interest can hold them together.

Mr. BYNUM then took the floor, and proceeded to reply with great earnestness to the remarks of Mr. ADAMS, and, in the course of it, being called to order by the Chair,

Mr. STANLEY insisted that his colleagues should not proceed without leave of the House.

Mr. TURNEY thereupon moved that the gentleman have leave, and it was granted without a division.

Mr. BYNUM concluded his remarks in opposition to the proposed instructions.

Mr. THOMPSON deprecated all discussion on this subject as derogatory to the South.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, moved to lay the motion for instructions on the table, and called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 110, nays 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Bronson, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chancy, Chapman, Cleveland, Connor, Crabbe, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, De Graff, Duncan, Ewing, Fry, Gallup, Rice Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Griffin, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Hawes, Herold, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Miller, Morgan, Murray, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kenble, Kennedy, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Menefee, Mercer, Miller, Plumer, Pope, Noble, Parker, Farris, Petrik, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rencher, Runsey, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Southgate, Spencer, Stanley, Stone, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thompson, Titus, Toney, Turney, Underwood, Vanderveer, Wazener, Webster, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yell—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dunn, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Willam Graham, Grennell, Hastings, Henry, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, McKennan, Taylor, Ruysey, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Salmonstall, Slade, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, and Yorke—46.

So the motion was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. HOPKINS asked leave to submit a motion, that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Wednesday.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!" with a few "Noes!"]

Mr. H., on the objection being made, moved a suspension of the rules, stating, that as the other branch of Congress had adjourned over Christmas day, he saw no reason why the House should not do so.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused; and the rules were suspended—ayes 130, noes 38.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 100, nays 69.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing the annual report, in compliance with the 18th section of an act of Congress, entitled an act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States; which was, on motion, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KENNEDY asked leave of the House to submit a resolution, giving the use of the Hall of Representatives to the American Sunday School Union, on Tuesday evening next, at half past seven o'clock.

Objection being made to its reception,

Mr. KENNEDY moved for a suspension of the rules to enable him to effect it.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the House adjourn; which was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the suspension of the rules, and decided in the negative.

Mr. GRAVES, on leave, presented the petition of Commodore Barney; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. PARRIS asked leave of the House to present a certain petition; before taking the question, however,

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the House, adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 26, 1838.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the petition of Simeon Geeron, praying confirmation of his claim to a tract of land under a grant from the State of Georgia; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of John Cummings, for remuneration for extra services; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. H. also presented some additional papers in relation to the claim of Loomis and Gay; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Lyon and Howard, contractors for building a steam dredging machine on Lake Champlain, praying compensation for extra services; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of Robert Townsend, a citizen of New York, praying for a repeal of the duty on the importation of coal; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. ALLEN, of Ohio, presented the petition of citizens of Erie county, Ohio, praying for the establishment of a national bank, the stock to be owned by the States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the petition of Lieutenant John Burrill, a soldier of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FULTON presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, asking for the passage of a law to authorize the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections of land granted for the use of schools, when unproductive, and the location of other lands in lieu thereof; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. F. also presented other resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, asking for the passage of a law to authorize those who had made improvements on seminary lands to float their preemption rights; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. LINN gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill authorizing payment of certain Missouri volunteers for services rendered in 1829 and 1836.

Mr. KING gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill to reimburse the corporation of the city of Mobile for certain advances made in equipping a volunteer company which served in the Creek war.

Mr. STRANGE gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William McKeever.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TIPTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill authorizing Peter Warner, of Indiana, to purchase a certain half section of land; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who are deprived of the benefits of the act granting preemption rights; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth section of land granted for the use of schools, and the location of other lands in lieu thereof; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which the subject had been referred, reported, without amendment, the bill for the relief of Jabez L. White and Asa White.

He also, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, the bill for the relief of certain persons therein named, and the bill for the relief of the Nantucket Steamboat Company.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Patents, asked that leave be granted to Charles Keller and Henry L. Stone to withdraw their petition and papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of the clerks in the Second Auditor's office, reported a bill for their benefit; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections, asked that it might be printed; which was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were submitted and adopted:

By Mr. LINN:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to improve the harbor of St. Louis, Missouri.

Also resolved, That the Secretary of War send to the Senate the report (if any has been made) of the engineer who had the superintendence of the public works undertaken for the purpose of improving the above harbor.

Also resolved, That so much of the different reports of the commissioners appointed under the acts of July, 1832 and 1833, for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri and Arkansas as have been acted on by Congress, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Missouri river, from its mouth to Fort Leavenworth.

Also resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing marine hospitals on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers; and also on the northern lakes; and that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and documents accompanying the same, be referred to said committee.

By Mr. STRANGE:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of affording relief to the securities of William B. Ferguson, and report by bill or otherwise.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the propriety of raising the salary allowed by law to the district judge of East and West Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road was postponed until Wednesday next.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill for the reduction and graduation of the price of public lands came up as the order of the day; when,

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, hoped that, on account of the thinness of attendance on the part of the members of the Senate, the consideration of the bill would not be urged at the present time. It would be recollected that, at his instance, this subject had been postponed when it was first brought up until the succeeding Monday; he had prepared himself to discuss the subject at that time; but in the interim, the whole subject, with the concurrence of the friends of the bill, was referred to the Committee on Finance. If this bill is to be passed, he hoped it would be passed after a full consideration by a full Senate.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that he hoped the Senator would not consent to postpone it to a day so distant. This bill, with the amendments as reported by the Committee on Public Lands, was the identical bill upon which the Senator from Kentucky and others who agreed with him were heard in opposition to it only four or five months ago. He was not disposed unnecessarily to urge the passage of the bill now; but it would be recollected that the debate on it occupied several days, and they had as yet heard no promise that any new views would be offered on the subject, or of any new occurrences that would affect it. It was first postponed at the request of the Senator from Kentucky until last Monday, and the report of the Committee on Finance, to which he referred, was brought in on the morning of that day, so that there was no occasion to delay the bill on that account. He was always willing to postpone a bill till there was a full Senate, and he would consent to the postponement now if the Senator would fix on some day not so distant as the one he had named; and he would propose that, instead of this day week, the postponement be made to Monday next.

After a few remarks from Messrs. CLAY, of Kentucky, and CLAY, of Alabama, the proposition of the latter was agreed to; and the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

Mr. BENTON said that the time this bill had been delayed had given him an opportunity of visiting the General Land Office, to ascertain how the graduation principle worked in the Chickasaw nation, where the principle was in operation, and was carried down to six and a quarter cents per acre; it was now at fifty cents per acre, about half way down. He learned that it worked admirably well; and he had no doubt it would work just as well for white men as it did for Indians. He moved that the papers embodying the information derived from the Land Office should be printed; which was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MARTIN VAN BUREN, jr., his Private Secretary, inclosing a communication relative to the fortifications on Pea Patch Island, in the Delaware river; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The following bills were severally read the second time, considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill for the relief of the owners of the brig Despatch;

The bill to reward the captors of the privateer Lydia;

The bill for the relief of the sureties of William Manning; and

The bill to refund to the Philadelphia and Baltimore Railroad Company certain duties paid by them on imported railroad iron.

ROADS IN ALABAMA.

The bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act for her admission into the Union, for the purpose of making a road or roads leading to said State, was also taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and after a debate, in which it was opposed by Mr. NILES, and advocated by Messrs. CLAY, of Alabama, WALKER, KING, and BENTON, it was postponed until tomorrow.

The Senate went into the consideration of executive business; after which, it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 26, 1838.

The SPEAKER communicated a letter from Hon. JOHN FAIRFIELD, a member from the State of Maine, resigning his seat in the present Congress; which, on motion of Mr. ANDERSON, was laid on the table, and the SPEAKER directed to notify the Executive of Maine of the fact.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. HAYNES then rose and said, that he believed from the commencement of the Government till the last session, the earliest opportunity was taken to consider the President's message, and the duty having, in a measure, devolved upon him, from having moved the reference, and the unusually long period of three weeks having elapsed since the message was received, he felt bound to submit a motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole thereon, for the purpose of distributing it.

Objection being made,

Mr. H. moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 112, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Casey, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Coles, Corwin, Crabbe, Craig, Crary, Cushing, Cushman, Davee, Davies, De Graff, Duane, Dunn, Everett, Fillmore, Foster, Gakop, James Garland, Glascock, James Graham, William Graham, Grant, Griffin, Haley, Hamer, Harrison, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Keim, Lincoln, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Parker, Parmenter, Paynter, Peck, Pettkin, Phelps, Pickens, Potts, Pratt, John L. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Randolph, Reed, Russell, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shepler, Shibley, Snyder, Stone, Stratton, Swearingen, Tillinghast, Toland, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Webster, John White, Whitesley, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Word, Yell, and York—112.

NAYS.—Messrs. Heman Allen, John W. Allen, William B. Campbell, Chambers, Cranston, Crockett, Giddings, Harlan, Harper, Howard, Henry Johnson, Menefee, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Rariden, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Saltonstall, Shields, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—26.

So the rules were suspended; and, on motion of Mr. HAYNES, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Adams in the chair,) and proceeded to take up the President's message.

Mr. HAYNES then moved the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That so much of the President's message as refers to the political relations of the United States with foreign nations, be committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the commerce of the United States with foreign nations, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

3. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the finances, to the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue, and the punishment of public defaulters, be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

4. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the public lands be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

5. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to Indian Affairs, except what concerns the defense of the frontiers against Indian hostilities and the protection of the Indians against the intrusions of the citizens of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

6. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the defense of the frontiers against Indian hostilities, and the protection of the Indian tribes from the intrusion of citizens of the United States; so much thereof as relates to the establishment of a manufactory of small-arms west of the Alleghany mountains, and to a manufactory of gunpowder; together with so much as relates to the report of the Secretary of War, and the public interests intrusted to the War Department, except the subjects embraced in the immediately preceding resolutions, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

7. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the militia of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

8. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the report of the Secretary of the Navy and the interests intrusted to the Navy Department, be committed to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

9. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the report of the Postmaster General and the condition and operations of the Post Office Department, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

10. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the District of Columbia, be committed to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

11. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the establishment of a national foundry for cannon, to be common to the service of the Army and Navy of the United States, be referred to a select committee, to report by bill or otherwise.

12. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the questions arising out of the mandamus issued by the circuit court of the District of Columbia, at the relation of Stockton and Stokes, against the Postmaster General, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

13. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the next census of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

Mr. BELL complained that the House had been taken by surprise by the motion, and he hoped the honorable mover would consent to let it lie over.

Mr. HAYNES expressed his surprise that the gentleman should be taken by surprise by a motion submitted at the end of three weeks which ought to have been made on every occasion that offered. He could assure the gentleman that he had no intention to take anybody by surprise, and, consistent with the sense of duty he felt upon this subject, he could not accede to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. BELL then proceeded to review the topics embraced in the message at length.

He was followed by Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, on whose motion the committee rose, and reported progress.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit for your consideration the inclosed communication accompanying documents from the Secretary of War relative to the present state of the Pea Patch Island in the Delaware river, and of the operations going on there for the erection of defenses for that important channel of commerce.

It will be seen from these documents that a complete stop has been put to these operations in consequence of the island having been taken possession of by the individual claimant, under the decision in his favor of the United States district court for the district of New Jersey, and that unless early measures are taken to bring the island again within the jurisdiction of the Government, great loss and injury will result to the future operations for carrying on the works. The importance of the subject would seem to render it worthy of the early attention of Congress.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 26, 1838.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the message be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and be printed.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was not particular to what committee it be referred; and withdrew his motion.

It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, in relation to the claims of Richard F. Barrett to fractional section of land in Illinois; which,

On motion of Mr. CASEY, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HAYNES asked leave to submit a motion to have the resolutions presented by him this day printed.

Leave being granted, the resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUSHING asked leave to submit a resolution to grant the use of the Hall of Representatives, on Friday evening, for the purpose of the delivery of an address upon the condition of the Oregon Territory.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

Mr. CUSHING moved that the rules be suspended to enable him to offer it.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the House adjourn. Not carried.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules—yeas 65, nays 34. No quorum voting.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 27, 1838.

The PRESIDENT presented the following report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to deposits in the United States Bank of Pennsylvania; and the sale and payment of its deposits:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 24, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to submit this report in compliance with the resolution of the Senate on the 19th instant, a copy of which is annexed.

The resolution calls for information concerning deposits in the United States Bank of Pennsylvania; the sale of its third bond; the payment of its second one; and various other matters supposed to be connected with those subjects.

The transactions between the Treasury and the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, which seem to be the general object of these inquiries, have been as follows:

1. The sale to that institution of the stock held by the Government in the Bank of the United States in pursuance of a law passed for that purpose; an account of which has been long since laid before Congress.

2. The receipt of payment from the United States Bank of Pennsylvania for two of its bonds about the time they became due, and which were given for that stock.

3. Collections made by that bank for the United States, in part payment of their demand against the old Bank of Columbia, from which the Bank of the United States had taken security for itself and for the United States many years ago, and to the performance of which trust the United States Bank of Pennsylvania had succeeded.

4. The payment by the latter bank to the United States of the sum of $300,000 in money and $59,000 in Treasury notes, in behalf of and at the instance of the Bank of Kentucky, in discharge for so much of its indebtedness to the United States.

5. The sale to the United States Bank of Pennsylvania of the third bond due from it to the United States in execution of the act of the last session authorizing it.

With these exceptions, there have not been dealings of any description between this Department and the United States Bank of Pennsylvania from its establishment to the present day. No collecting or disbursing officer has ever been directed by this Department to make any deposit whatever in said bank, nor has any money been placed by the said bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States or of this Department, or, to my knowledge, of any of its officers, except the avails of the transactions specifically referred to above; and, on the details of which, so far as they relate to the present subject, full information is given in the correspondence and tabular statements annexed.

The sale of the third bond of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania to that institution, concerning which a more special inquiry is made in the resolution, was effected under the following circumstances: Before the passage of the law authorizing it, an application was made to the Department by the bank, to anticipate the payment of a portion of the debt due from it to the United States, upon certain terms proposed by its agent. This application failed of effect, because the bank was dissatisfied with the conditions as to the kind of currency to be paid which were prescribed by the Department. The correspondence upon that subject is considered to be embraced within the call of the Senate, and is herewith annexed. Apprehending that the resources of the Treasury would not, in the then deranged state of the business and currency of the country, with certain imperfections that existed in the laws as to Treasury notes, be sufficient to satisfy the appropriations made by Congress, the President, some months before the adjournment of the last session, specially invited the attention of both Houses to the necessity of further provision for the exigencies of the public service.

An act was afterwards passed authorizing an issue of new Treasury notes, instead of the old ones paid in during the year. It becoming obvious that this measure would not of itself be sufficient under the large appropriation contemplated, a bill was also reported allowing the sale of the third and fourth bonds held by the Government against the bank. The bill, as reported and finally passed, contained a restriction limiting the sale to "the par value of the bond sold at the time of sale, calculated according to the rules for estimating the par value of securities upon which interest has run for a time, but which securities have not reached maturity," and it conferred on the Department no authority to enter into any guarantee by the United States of the ultimate payment of the bonds. Apprehensive that it would be difficult, if not impossible to effect a sale of the bonds or either of them upon these terms, the Department, whilst the bill was pending, opened a correspondence to ascertain whether the same could probably be accomplished, if the bill became a law. This correspondence is annexed. The replies strengthened the apprehension before entertained by the Department, and the result was communicated to the chairmen of the financial committees of the two Houses before the final action of Congress upon the bill.

But the bill afterwards became a law without any alteration in the terms, or any guarantee to be given, on the part of the United States. The appropriations actually made having proved to be unusually great, and the expenditures anticipated during the two next ensuing months being much larger in amount than the immediate means which the Department would expect to derive in money from other sources within those months, I at once addressed letters to bankers of the United States at London and to our Minister at Paris, requesting that measures might be taken, without delay, to obtain offers for those bonds, if possible, from capitalists in Europe. To these, answers were received in due season, stating that from the short time the bonds had to run, the absence of the guarantee of the United States for their eventual payment, and other causes, no sale could probably be effected of them either in London or Paris within the limits fixed by law. In the meantime, however, finding that the demands for the public service during the month of June, had exceeded four and a half million dollars, and expecting, as the fact turned out to be, that they would equal about seven millions in July and August, and finding, also, that the available balance in the Treasury, applicable to general purposes and subject to draft, fell below one million dollars, and that payments were making at times in new Treasury notes, which could not be rendered at all available, I considered it necessary to effect a sale of at least one of the bonds at an earlier day than advices could be received, and any proceeds realized from Europe. Particular inquiry was, therefore, instituted in the city of New York, and elsewhere, concerning the probability of selling soon one or more of the bonds, and, also, a public advertisement was issued, inviting proposals generally for their purchase.

The result was, that from the abundance of State stocks in the market, at very reduced prices, the lower rate at which other securities of the bank were selling, and the want of a guarantee by the United States, the sale was found, with the exception hereafter stated, to be wholly impracticable in this country, and was expected to be so abroad, under the conditions prescribed in the act. Indeed, no bids were at any time made for either of the bonds, in conformity to those conditions, except that of Charles Macalister, Esq., of Philadelphia, who offered to purchase both of them within the terms of the law. In answer to some other particular inquiries on this point, I would observe that the purchase-money for the bond which was sold, "was placed to the credit of the Treasurer on the books of the bank," the 1st day of August, 1838.

"The terms on which it was negotiated" were at the par value of the bond at that time, computing it under the limitations prescribed in the act of Congress, and the payment was expressly stipulated to be made in specie, or its equivalent, and placed to the credit of the Treasurer in special deposit in the Bank of the United States. The Department, hoping it might be able to get through the year without the sale of more than one bond, provided the second one, due in September, was paid punctually, and in money rather than new Treasury notes not reissuable; and if disappointed in this, that it might soon have a better offer from abroad, concluded the sale unconditionally of only one bond. But it may be proper here to notice the circumstance that as no other offer has since been received in this country or Europe to purchase either of the bonds for cash within the terms of the act, and as it will probably be found necessary to sell the other bond during the present year, embarrassment may arise in effecting the sale within those terms, except to the bank itself, unless Congress authorize the guarantee to be given of its eventual payment. Indeed, it will be perceived, from these remarks and the annexed correspondence, that the authority to make sale of the remaining bond, as limited in the present law, if continued without alteration will, in effect, as it has done already, amount to a direction to sell the same, when necessary, to the United States Bank. The likelihood of offers from other quarters to buy it is no greater now than heretofore.

Inquiry is next made as to the "particulars of any understanding or agreement that the proceeds of the same should be left in deposit with the said bank, until wanted in the ordinary disbursements of the Government."

Those particulars, as shown in the letters annexed, were, that the bank should, without expense or cost to the United States, hold this money in special deposit to the credit of the Treasurer, till the same was wanted for the public service, and should then pay his various drafts, as presented, without any charge to the Treasury.

The Department being deprived of its usual depositories, and the sum being very large, these stipulations were readily assented to. To avoid the payment of the bond that was to fall due on the 1st of October, being made in new Treasury notes, not reissuable, nor available in any way to discharge appropriations, and which event was apprehended by the Department, the written agreement was made with the bank, which will be found among the documents, stipulating, among other things, for the payment of that bond on drafts to the public creditors, and in specie or its equivalent. This, though collateral to the sale of the other bonds, was a part of the same negotiation.

It was very clear at the time, and has been confirmed by subsequent events, that the payment by the bank of its bond in such Treasury notes, and a failure to make that arrangement the only practicable one for the sale of the third bond, would render either a special call of Congress or a suspension of payment of some of the demands upon the Treasury inevitable. The Department did not feel itself at liberty to hesitate in deciding between an exposure of the public service to either of those extremities, by insisting upon having the whole of these large sums of money paid at one time, and placed elsewhere in other suitable depositories, if any could be found in the present imperfect state of the law, or a consent to leave them in the hands of the public debtor until they were actually wanted, and then to draw for them, in specie or its equivalent, when and where the public service required. Especially could the Department not hesitate when this course was not injurious to that service, and it was unable at the time to withdraw those funds, except by the debtor's voluntary consent.

With regard to the other inquiry under this head, as to "what understanding or arrangement, if any, has taken place respecting the benefit which might accrue to the bank in the transfer of money it would make to distant places on account of the Government," I would remark that no such understanding or agreement existed on the side of this Department, in respect to the third bond, when the sale was effected.

But soon after this was done, being apprised that the bank entertained an impression, derived from some communications between it and the War Department, and perhaps from the correspondence in April last, before referred to, that the money would chiefly be required for military purposes, in sums of about a half a million monthly, at certain points convenient to the War Department, as had been suggested in communications with others, and that an expectation existed with the bank that the money would mostly be called for at those points, I entered into an arrangement to meet this expectation. Such a course appeared to be required by a proper regard to equitable considerations, and, while operating, it is supposed, in some respects beneficially to the bank, was at the same time not prejudicial to the Treasury; but, in connection with the arrangement made as to the earlier times and convenient places of paying the second bond, proved highly conducive to promptitude and efficiency in the public service.

In relation to another inquiry concerning "the period when the sum of $1,600,000, in part payment of the second bond of the Bank of the United States was placed to the credit of the Treasurer," I state that $800,000 was placed to his credit on the 15th day of August, and $800,000 more on the 15th September, 1838. As to the "nature of the" whole agreement on that subject, I reply that it will be found in the correspondence annexed.

The substance of it was that about one third of the amount of the bond should be paid in the middle of August, one third in the middle of September, and the other third in the middle of October, as these periods and amounts of payment were deemed likely to promote the convenience of the Treasury, if not of both parties, better than to pay the whole large sum of near two and a half millions at once at the close of the month of September. It was further stipulated that interest should cease on each of the installments thus paid on the day they were placed to the credit of the Treasurer, and made subject to his draft. As the money was wanted at different points to meet the public expenditures near them, the drafts of the Treasurer on the bank, payable at those several points, were engaged to be met there with promptitude, and in specie or its equivalent.

In answer to the inquiry as to "the aggregate balance standing weekly to the credit of the Treasurer in the Bank of the United States, its branches or agencies, whether subject to draft or not, as well as the weekly aggregate balance in the Treasury, from the time the first deposit was made in the said bank of moneys arising from the payment or sale of its bonds up to the present period," a statement is annexed, which gives the particulars requested.

It may be proper to add, in connection with these balances, that, between the suspension of specie payments and August, 1838, the receipts for duties, except after May last, at New York and east of it, were not in any considerable degree in money, and hence were not often to be drawn for or deposited anywhere. Besides what was in the United States Bank and the Mint, the money in the Treasury from April to September, which was subject to draft and available for general purposes, is believed to have been sometimes less than two hundred thousand dollars, and seldom to have equaled a million.

Deprived as the Department was of most of its general depositories since the spring of 1837, and without any specific, well-guarded system instead of them having been provided by law, the drafts of the Treasurer, when any money was collected, as it has been largely since the more general resumption of specie payments in August, were therefore directed to be drawn first on those collectors and receivers who had no bank of general deposit, and resided near the place of disbursement.

In this way most of the funds in the hands of collectors and receivers have been drawn for earliest, or the amount in their hands kept low by deposits in appropriate banks, while, in general, little has been drawn from any banks, except what was from time to time needed to supply the deficiency.

Consequently, their aggregate balances have changed slowly in amount. But the funds due from the United States Bank, and allowed to remain there till wanted, being frequently needed at points where the amounts held by the collectors and receivers were small, have been drawn for more rapidly than those in most other banks. Indeed, on the 17th instant, they had been drawn for to an amount equal to the whole of the third bond sold, and all of the second bond afterwards paid, except $1,232,317, leaving still subject to draft only that balance, and the amount of $300,000 which it assumed to pay to the United States for the Bank of Kentucky.

Information is also desired in the resolution concerning "all the branches or agencies of the said Bank of the United States, on which the Treasury Department has drawn drafts, the amount of public money directed to be placed at each, and of the drafts severally drawn on them, and the rates of exchange between Philadelphia, and each of the places to which sums were ordered to be transferred."

All the drafts drawn on any funds in the United States Bank have been drawn on the bank itself. But in cases where the disbursement was to be made near the points heretofore mentioned, as arranged for partial payments, the drafts have, by a memorandum attached to them, been made payable at those points by the persons or local banks, previously designated for that purpose to the Treasurer by the United States Bank. A schedule is annexed of the points or places of payments; the amount of money agreed to be paid at each of those points; the persons, agents, or banks indicated at each, and the amount of drafts already drawn on each.

It will be seen that at several of them the whole sums have been drawn for, and the residue will probably be needed in a few weeks.

The inquiry as to "the rates of exchange between Philadelphia and each of the places to which sums were ordered to be transferred," cannot be otherwise answered than by saying that no such transfers have been ordered; but the rates between that city and some of the places of payment agreed on, and detailed in the schedule, can be given, so far as they appear in the different prices current received at this office. No particular date being specified in the resolution, and the exchange having varied greatly between the 1st of August and the present period, I can only add, that from the sale of the bond till recently, the rates are believed to have been nominally high, on account of the deranged condition of the currency and the continued suspension of specie payments by most of the banks in the West and Southwest. But, at the same time specie or its equivalent was, at that period, quoted in many of those places at a large per cent. higher than the local currency; so that the difference in exchange between them and Philadelphia, in specie or its equivalent, or in Treasury notes, or in United States Bank notes, is believed not in reality to have been large, and that all these were often at a higher premium, varying from one and a half to two per cent., than even bills of exchange on Philadelphia. Thus, as an illustration, at Nashville, on the 20th July, exchange on the east is quoted at eight and a half to nine, specie at nine to eleven, Treasury notes at ten, and United States Bank notes at nine to ten, or from one half to one and a half per cent. higher than exchange. So on the 12th of September, at Natchez, exchange on Philadelphia and New York is quoted at fifteen to sixteen premium, and United States Bank notes and Treasury notes at seventeen to eighteen, and specie at eighteen; making specie or Treasury notes or United States Bank notes there from two to three per cent. more valuable than exchange on New York or Philadelphia.

In conclusion, the resolution asks for "the amount, so far as it can be conveniently ascertained, that has been drawn from the Bank of the United States, its branches, or agencies, or in notes of said bank, for paying Indian annuities, or other claims of the Indians on the Government, or for defraying the expenses attending the removal of the Indians, and, in general, the nature of the arrangements, if any, made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank, together with all the correspondence, agreements, or instructions, given or entered into, connected with any or all the heads of inquiry above stated."

The Department generally has no means of information in its power as to the kind of money which is actually paid by the banks on any of the Treasurer's drafts. But the original agreements in this case having been that the payments should be in specie or its equivalent, and the public creditors and public officers knowing that they were entitled to these, it is to be presumed that they have generally, if not always, been made in this manner.

No arrangements have been formed by this Department, nor any instructions given by it, as to any different kind of payment. All the drafts placed on the bank have been duly honored, so far as the information of this Department extends, except in one case at Mobile, where the agent of the bank did not, in the first instance, offer the kind of currency demanded; but it was afterwards paid satisfactorily, and without prejudice to the public service.

With regard to the call, under this head, for "all the correspondence, agreements, and instructions given or entered into by the Department, and connected with any or all the heads of inquiry above stated," copies of all supposed to bear on the subject are annexed.

The closing paragraph of this part of the resolution further requests to be informed by the Secretary of the Treasury "of the nature of the arrangements made with him by those banks; in which, according to his report of the 3d instant, portions of the public money have been placed to the credit of the Treasurer on special deposit; the kind of money in which the said special deposit was made; whether the same was entered on the books of the bank; whether the identical moneys deposited have continued to be held by the banks; whether the drafts of the Treasury Department that have been drawn on these deposits have been paid in the specific moneys deposited; and whether the balances remaining are part and parcel of the very moneys originally deposited."

The arrangements made with the banks that hold special deposits, or deposits to the special credit of the Treasurer, have been regarded as temporary in their nature or character, and have in most cases, therefore, been informal. It having been expected that Congress would, at an early day, adopt some general system that could be carried into practical effect on the subject of keeping the public money, and comparatively few collections having been made, except in Treasury notes and Treasury drafts, since the suspension of specie payments, till within the last three months, the Department has deemed it most respectful to Congress to abstain from adopting any uniform and permanent arrangement on the subject of deposits in banks not selected under the general deposit act, but to use them, for the present at least, only as necessity should require.

The deposit act of June, 1836, not having been repealed, it is still the duty of the Department to place all of the public moneys in general deposit in banks, if suitable ones can be found, which are in a condition to comply with the requirements of that act, and are willing to take them. But, as stated in the annual report, a sufficient number of them to satisfy the requirements of that branch of the public service could not be found. No public moneys can by the existing laws be deposited with collectors or receivers, except such as have been collected by themselves. In the absence, therefore, of a sufficient number of banks under the general deposit act, and without a provision by law for the deposit of the public moneys elsewhere, though anxiously desired by the Department, it has been obliged to employ other banks under its general powers, exercised since 1789; when not otherwise expressly provided by Congress. These have been used to keep such moneys as accumulated in the hands of the collectors and receivers, beyond what was deemed safe under their present securities and liabilities, and also such as were paid into the Treasury from other sources.

In cases of deposits in bank, made specially, the money has, in some instances, been placed in specie, in boxes, fastened up, and not to be withdrawn by the receiver or others, without the draft of the Treasurer on him, payable at the bank where the specie deposit was made. In other cases, it has been placed in specie, or bills of specie-paying banks, to the credit of the Treasurer, sometimes as "in special deposits," and sometimes as "in deposit to his special credit," and allowing the bank to have entire charge of it afterwards.

But in all these latter cases, as explained in the recent annual report on the finances, it is understood that the money is to be kept ready for payment at any moment, but is not required to be set apart, or specially secured in a box, chest, or bag. It may be paid out by the officers of the bank, on the draft of the Treasurer, without his presence or that of the depositor; and access must, of course, be constantly had to it by those officers.

No other course of deposit of our current funds is practicable in fiscal operations, without incurring an expense which the Department, without express legislation, did not feel warranted in incurring, for the temporary objects contemplated during the last few months.

In answer to the further specific questions in the concluding clause of the resolution, it may be added that, in some of these cases, the kind of money deposited is stated by the receiver or collector in his return, and in some it is reported by the banks; but it is always supposed to be in legal currency.

It is presumed that, in some cases, the drafts are paid out of the identical money deposited, but in a few only that the precise money deposited is retained till then, and the balance remaining a part of the original deposit.

Should Congress adjourn without making any new provision as to the keeping of the public money, and should much of it accumulate at several points before it is disbursed, the Department would feel bound, under its supervisory duty of seeing that this money be kept safely as possible, to adopt some uniform rule on the subject of deposits, whether special or general, in banks not able to be selected under the act of 1836.

It would feel obliged, also, to introduce some general system for its faithful custody till paid out, provided a sufficiency of banks, at suitable places, could not be obtained, in conformity to the act. But it would deeply regret the necessity of being left to the exercise of powers so wide and general—powers so likely to be misused, misunderstood, and misrepresented; and ardently hopes, as often stated on former occasions, to be relieved from the responsibility, as well as necessity, of doing it, by some specific legislation for keeping the public money which may be suited to the present condition of the country, be susceptible of a safe, uniform, and practical operation, and afford those checks and securities which are so essential to the preservation of public morality, as well as public faith.

Respectfully,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.
HON. RICHARD M. JOHNSON,

When the report was read,

Mr. NILES moved that five thousand additional copies should be printed. He said he would state very briefly the reasons which induced him to move for printing an extra number of copies of the report. The importance of the paper, he thought, might fully justify the motion he had submitted; but as he was not in the habit of asking for printing, he should not have done it in this instance, had there not been special reasons to which he desired to call the attention of the Senate.

The course which the mover [Mr. RIVES] of the resolutions, to which this report is a response, saw fit to pursue, when they were under consideration, was very extraordinary and wholly unexampled, so far as his experience went; and he doubted whether any precedent could be found of a proceeding so unusual and, in his judgment, so unjust. The resolution, being one of inquiry only, its adoption was a matter of course; yet the gentleman had made it the occasion for a long, and evidently a prepared, speech, occupying nearly two hours. This premeditated assault on the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President himself, containing charges and insinuations of a very grave character, was based on an assumption of the truth of the facts called for in the resolution. The Secretary was first condemned, and the sentence pronounced against him has been, or will be, published and sent forth to the world, and afterwards was to be permitted to be heard in his defense. It was not his purpose now to speak of the unfairness and injustice of this proceeding; but he alluded to it as a reason why we ought to publish an extra number of the report, which was not only an answer to the resolutions, but also to the gentleman's speech. He did not complain of the Senator's course; it was, perhaps, perfectly proper for him, in his anxiety to criminate the Administration, to make his speech first, and obtain the facts upon which it purports to be founded afterwards. But as the speech had gone forth to the country, it was certainly proper that the report should also be circulated somewhat extensively, that the people might understand the facts in the case, and be able to decide how far the imputations rest on any foundation in truth. This premeditated blow at the Administration, however unexpected, and coming from a quarter which heretofore had professed friendship, gave him, as one of its humble supporters, no sort of uneasiness or apprehension. He had carefully listened to the report, and, if he had not misunderstood it, it was a complete answer to the Senator's speech, and a most satisfactory explanation and refutation of all his gratuitous accusations.

If he did not misapprehend the speech, the burden of the Senator's complaint was, that the Administration, in conducting the concerns of the Treasury the past year, had departed from its avowed principles, and had acted in conformity to the Senator's own views. This seems to be the essential ground of complaint; and he would not stop to inquire with what propriety such a complaint came from the quarter it did. It is made a serious charge against the Secretary, and even against the President, that they have restored the connection between the Treasury and the banks, and have revived the deposit system; and made use of the agency of banks, particularly the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States. This is the charge: that the Secretary has done precisely what the Senator so often told us he ought to do—made use of the State banks as depositories and fiscal agents to disburse and transfer the public funds where they may be wanted. All this, it is alleged, is wholly inconsistent with the avowed purposes of the Administration and its supporters here, who, during the last two sessions of Congress, occupied no small portion of their time in attempting to effect an entire separation of the financial concerns of the Government from all banks.

It seems now to be insinuated that in these efforts neither the Executive nor his supporters on this floor were sincere, and that the real object was to use the banks without any legal regulation or restraint. How this insinuation is to be reconciled with the charge, so zealously urged and so long persevered in by the Senator and those with whom he acted, he left for the gentleman and his new friends to decide. It was sufficient for his present purpose to say, that the report which had just been read proved conclusively to his mind that the Administration had not revived the deposit system, nor in any respect changed its views on this subject. It appeared that the transactions with the United States Bank were entirely confined to the sale by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the bank, of two of its own bonds, which were stipulated to be paid for in specie, and drafts on the bank deemed equivalent to specie. So much of the avails of the bonds as was not wanted for immediate use was permitted to remain in the bank, which was the original debtor of the United States, and placed to the credit of the Treasurer. These drafts were, some of them, paid by other banks as agencies, at distant points, where the convenience of the public service required, but were all drawn on the United States Bank and the fund received for the sale of the two bonds.

If there was anything wrong in the negotiation of these bonds to the United States Bank, (and he could not perceive that there was,) the Secretary tells us that it was an act of necessity, as the Treasury could not get along without the money, and as no other purchaser, either in this country or in Europe, could be found—the difficulty of negotiating the bonds to any one but the Bank of the United States, which was the debtor, being increased in consequence of the act of Congress, which authorized the sale, containing no provision that authorized the guarantee on the part of the United States of their ultimate payment. It appears that no public moneys have been deposited either on special or general deposit with the Bank of the United States, and that its agency has in no way been used or sought by the Treasury, except in regard to the payment of its own bonds, which had been purchased in upon terms more advantageous to the Treasury than could be obtained from any other quarter. The delay in paying over the avails was no doubt advantageous to the bank, without being detrimental to the Government; as the money was paid when wanted for the public service.

In these transactions, growing entirely out of the claims of the United States upon the bank, he could see nothing that looked like a revival of the deposit system, or a concession that the agency of banks is necessary in conducting the concerns of the Treasury.

In regard to other State banks it appears that the only connection the Treasury has had with any of them—except those four or five, he believed, which were still depositories under the act of 1836—was, that in some few instances special deposits had been made in some of them. In the absence of any general law to regulate the action of the Treasury—the deposit system being broken down, yet a fragment of it remaining, only sufficient to embarrass the action of the Department—it must be apparent that during the past year the finances could not have been conducted on any uniform and settled principle. The Secretary has been compelled to act on different rules, according to the circumstances under which the public revenues have been placed, for their security and safe-keeping. In some instances he had found it necessary to make special deposits in banks, from the failure of legislation on the subject. These deposits have been made according to special and particular contracts, and not in pursuance of any general regulation or system adopted by the Department. In some cases the public funds have been kept by themselves; in others not. These deposits appear to have all been temporary, and, in the absence of any general system, to have been necessary and convenient, from the condition of the public revenue, at the points where they were made. These temporary deposits involved no agency of the banks, as they did not disburse them.

In these facts, which appear from the report, he could see nothing to support the charge to which he had referred, that the deposit system had been restored, nor any evidence of a desire to revive it. Without any substitute being provided, the concerns of the Treasury had been managed the past year, and one of great difficulty, without any agency of banks, except in the few instances mentioned in the report, of intrusting to some of them, temporarily, special deposits. All he desired was that the facts should go out to the public; and this, which, perhaps, under any circumstances, would be proper, was demanded by every consideration of justice, on account of the unusual and extraordinary course which the mover of the resolutions has seen fit to pursue.

Mr. N's motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of sundry citizens of New York, praying that Indian Key may be made a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Charles H. Todd, praying for a remission of certain duties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBBINS presented the petition of the Manual Labor Society of the City of Washington, praying for an act of incorporation; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Richard Coulter, praying for permission to enter a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. L. also presented the petition of certain citizens of the District of Columbia, stating that they are associated for the purpose of rearing the morus multicaulis, and asking for a charter and the lease of certain public lots; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a communication from the Intendant of Cheraw, South Carolina, inclosing the proceedings of a public meeting of the citizens, on certain mail arrangements to that place; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. C. also presented the petition of Mr. McKay, a citizen of Charleston, stating that in consequence of information given by him, a vessel was seized and confiscated under the embargo laws, and asking compensation therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the memorial of Laurent Millaudon, asking for permission to erect wharves on the eastern shore of Mobile bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG presented two memorials from citizens of Illinois, praying for the creation of the new mail routes therein mentioned; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of Lydia White, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. M. also presented the petition of Joseph Radcliff, praying compensation for losses sustained under a contract with the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Adam Gorham, stating that he had performed certain services at New Orleans, under the order of Commodore Porter, and asking remuneration therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALL presented a petition from an association styling themselves the friends of the slave, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and of the slave trade between the different States; which he moved should be received, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion to receive was, on motion of Mr. KING, laid on the table.

Mr. KNIGHT presented a petition of similar import; which he moved should be received.

The motion to receive was, on motion of Mr. KING, laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, presented the petition of Rufus K. Lane, an officer of the last war, asking for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented the memorial of a number of citizens of New York, deprecating war, and praying Congress to adopt some measures for the formation of a congress of nations, to settle disputes between nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. C. also presented the petition of a number of manufacturers of starch, of the city of New York, praying for the imposition of a duty on imported starch; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Obed P. Lacy, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill for the relief of Isabella Hill, widow, and John Hill, Elizabeth Hill, and Samuel Hill, children and minor heirs-at-law, of Samuel Hill, deceased;

A bill to continue in force the "Act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri," approved July, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved March 2, 1833;

A bill for the relief of Sebastian Butcher, and the heirs and legal representatives of Bartholomew Butcher, Michael Butcher, and Peter Bloom;

A bill for the relief of Joseph Boggy;

A bill for the relief of Michael Ambrister; and

A bill to authorize the issuing of a patent to the heirs or legal representatives of Francis Rivaud, deceased.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections of land granted for the use of schools, and the location of other lands in lieu thereof; also the bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands who were deprived of the benefits of the preemption act of June 19, 1834, reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Peter Warner, of Indiana, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Asa Armington; also the bill for the relief of Elisha Eldridge, reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Thomas W. Owen, John W. Skidmore, and others, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the following bills, reported the same severally without amendment:

The bill to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri;

The bill to confirm certain land claims in the Washita district, Indiana;

Two bills for the relief of Charles Morgan, of Louisiana; and

The bill to confirm certain claims to lands between the Rio Hondo and Sabine.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred the petition of James H. Bradford, made an unfavorable report on the same.

Mr. P., from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Samuel Collins, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Elias Carpenter, Jacob Slye, and Jedediah Hunt.

On motion of Mr. P., the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Esther Sampson.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were submitted and agreed to:

By Mr. LYON:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing at the city of Detroit, in the State of Michigan, an hospital for the relief of the sick and disabled seamen and navigators of the great American lakes.

By Mr. CLAY, of Alabama:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at the city of St. Joseph, in the Territory of Florida.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KING, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the corporate authorities of Mobile; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. STRANGE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of William Lefevre, of North Carolina; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LYON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Daniel Goodwin; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. ROBINSON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Daniel B. Bush; which was read twice and referred.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. MERRICK gave notice that he would tomorrow introduce a bill for the relief of the heirs of Francis Newman, late collector of direct taxes in the State of Maryland.

Mr. TALLMADGE gave notice that he would hereafter ask leave to introduce a joint resolution proposing certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of the owners of the brig Despatch;

The bill to reward the captors of the privateer Lydia;

The bill for the relief of the sureties of William Manning, late collector of the customs for the district of Beaufort, North Carolina; and

The bill to refund to the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company the duties paid by them on certain imported railroad iron.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. NILES, the memorial and papers of Commodore Isaac Hull, on the files of the last session, were again referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ROADS IN ALABAMA.

The Senate took up, as the unfinished business of yesterday, the bill to grant to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund, reserved by the act providing for her admission into the Union, for the purpose of making a road or roads leading to said State.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by providing that it shall not take effect till the 1st January, 1840.

After a debate, in which Messrs. BENTON, CLAY of Alabama, KING, NILES, CLAY of Kentucky, WALKER, CRITTENDEN, LINN, and CALHOUN took part, the amendment of Mr. BENTON was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan;

The bill to change the location of the office of surveyor of the land district composed of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan; and

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause the reserved lead mines in Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, to be sold as other public lands; were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the Senate went into executive business; after which,

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a tabular statement prepared by the Register in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 17th instant, relative to the sums of money paid out of the Treasury under private appropriations, and the particulars connected therewith, since December, 1833; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 27, 1838.

WISCONSIN CONTESTED ELECTION.

The report of the Committee of Elections on the right to the seat of the Delegate from Wisconsin being the special order for to-day,

Mr. BUCHANAN, chairman of the committee, hoped this subject would be postponed to some future time, as the House was to-day very thinly attended. He would therefore move that the consideration of this subject be postponed till Monday next, at one o'clock, and continue to be the order of the day, from day to day, at the same hour, until the subject be disposed of.

Mr. HAMER suggested that Wednesday or Thursday next would be a much better day than Monday, inasmuch as it would give to those gen-members who were absent, and who wished to speak upon the subject, time to arrive and prepare themselves for the discussion.

Mr. BUCHANAN modified his motion, in accordance with the suggestion of Mr. HAMER, to Thursday next.

The question was taken on making it the special order for that day; and resulted—yeas 78, nays 37, (no quorum voting.)

Mr. HOWARD inquired of Mr. BUCHANAN at whose request the motion for postponement was made, and if the gentleman (the sitting member) on whose motion the subject has been postponed till this day, wished a further postponement? If that gentleman was not prepared to enter into the discussion, he would willingly agree to a further postponement; but if not, he was anxious that the subject should be taken up.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it was not at his instance the motion had been made, but in consideration of the large number of members absent. He thought the time of the House would be economized by postponing it.

Mr. BRONSON said that the sitting member had intimated to him that he would prefer the subject should be postponed; upon which intimation it had been his intention to make such a motion if he had not been preceded in it by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, said he was willing and anxious for the postponement till Thursday next, to afford the many gentlemen whom he knew desired to speak upon the subject an opportunity of so doing. They would be in their seats at that time.

The question was then taken on the postponement till Thursday next; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 40.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. HAYNES moved that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the same subject on which the House was in committee yesterday.

Mr. LINCOLN asked the gentleman to withdraw his motion to enable the House to dispose of an engrossed joint resolution which was now on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HAYNES refused to withdraw his motion.

Mr. CUSHING asked the gentleman if he would give way for a moment, to enable him to offer the same resolution which he submitted to the House yesterday, granting the use of the Hall to Professor Lee, to deliver an address upon the condition of the Oregon territory?

Mr. HAYNES refused.

Mr. CUSHING objected to the motion of Mr. HAYNES to go into committee.

Mr. HAYNES then called for a suspension of the rules, to enable him to submit his motion; which being decided in the affirmative, the House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. ADAMS in the chair) to consider the President's message.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. HAYNES proposing to refer the various topics embraced in the message to appropriate committees being before the committee,

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, who was entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday, and having reviewed at some length the various topics embraced in the message, and in particular that part having reference to the defalcations, concluded about four o'clock; at which time,

Mr. CUSHMAN, who obtained the floor, moved, at the suggestion of several members, that the committee now rise.

The committee accordingly rose and reported progress.

WORKMEN ON THE TREASURY BUILDING.

Mr. LINCOLN asked the indulgence of the House that the joint resolution proposing to indemnify the workmen on the Treasury building for the loss of time during the suspension of their labors last summer, which was ordered to be engrossed a few days ago, be now read a third time.

No objection being made, the resolution received its third reading; when

Mr. RENCHER objected to the passage of the resolution. He considered the principle involved in it as unjust. The petitioners would make it appear that the Government was under an obligation to pay them their wages, whether they were at work or not. But he maintained that if there was any obligation at all, that obligation was reciprocal; and that the workmen were as much bound to remain with Government, as the latter was to pay them. He knew that no one would contend for a moment the workmen had not the power to leave at any time and seek employment elsewhere; therefore the Government could upon no principle of justice be required to pay them when their services were not demanded. With these views, he moved the reference of the whole subject to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LINCOLN hoped the gentleman would not persist in his motion, as it would be very easy to satisfy him that the claim was based on the strictest principles of equity. Mr. L. then went on to show that the laborers had come from a great distance, and were engaged under a promise that they should be employed for the whole season. All they sought for was indemnity for the actual loss sustained during the suspension of the work by order of the President; and the resolution provided that, if they had in the interim obtained employment elsewhere, such amount should be deducted. The fact was, the men considered themselves bound to continue in the city under their agreement, for they did not know how soon they might be required to resume the work. It was true the amount of loss was small; but to poor men with large families, and who had no other resources, it was an important object. He felt confident that, after such an explanation, all opposition would be withdrawn.

Before taking the question, however,

On motion of Mr. LEGARE, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 28, 1838.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of Philip Barbour, asking compensation for certain tracts of land taken from him by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented additional documents in relation to the claim of Lyon and Howard; which were referred.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of Frederick Gebhart, praying that certain duties may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of Moses Turner, for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIVES presented the petition of John Roberts, praying for the passage of a law exonerating him from his liability as a security; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of the Petersburg Railroad Company, in relation to a mail contract; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of the heirs of Colonel William Grayson; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. YOUNG presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, for a survey of the northern and western lakes, and the navigable waters entering into the same; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MERRICK, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Colonel Francis Newman; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. MOUTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Don Carlos Debault Delassus; which was read twice and referred.

The reports of the Committee on Pensions unfavorable to the petitions of Jedediah Hunt, H. Tucker, Elias Carpenter, Holly Raper, Jacob Sly, and James H. Bradford, were severally considered and concurred in.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and Arkansas to institute suits to try the validity of their claims," approved May 26, 1834.

Also, a bill for the relief of James Cochran.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to explain and limit the powers of the circuit court of the District of Columbia; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of Agnes Dundas, reported a bill for her relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the bill to amend the act confirming certain land claims in Michigan, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LINN, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain preemption claims to lands in Indiana, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. L., from the same committee, to which had been referred the memorial of Philip Barbour, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. STRANGE, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the consideration of the petition of William R. Cheever, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. LINN, leave was given to William Triplett to withdraw his petition and papers.

SALT DUTIES.

Mr. BENTON rose to submit a motion, and hoped that he might engage the particular attention of the Senate to it, because he was unwilling that any member should vote on any subject without distinctly understanding it. The motion, which he deemed to be of the greatest importance, was somewhat different from motions generally made in Congress, as it had no relation to politics, but related solely to the agricultural interests of the country, the laboring classes, and those engaged in the pursuits of industry. He would now proceed to state his motion, or rather to read it, as he had reduced it to writing for the sake of precision and to enable the Secretary with greater facility to take it down: His motion was to print certain papers relating to the salt duties, and to the use of salt in agriculture and the various departments of the animal economy and vegetable kingdom. The first of these papers owed its origin to inquiries set on foot in England by Lord Kenyon, before the Board of Trade, when Mr. Vansittart was president of that body. The other was a series of evidence taken before the House of Commons, for the purpose of showing the effects of the salt duty on the interests of the agricultural classes. Both of these papers were ordered by the House of Commons to be printed.

Mr. B. here read his motion, as follows:

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That — thousand copies of the following papers be ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate:

1. Copies of written evidence (as required by an order of the British House of Commons, dated 24th June, 1817) which was laid before the Board of Trade, the right honorable Nicholas Vansittart being president, in a survey recently made at the instance of Lord Kenyon and Sir Thomas Bernard, as to the supposed operation of the salt duty and restrictions on the fisheries, agriculture, and laboring classes of the Kingdom of Great Britain. (Ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, 4th of July, 1817, thirty-five folio pages.)

2. The report of the select committee of the British House of Commons, appointed in the year 1818, to take into consideration the laws relating to the salt duties, and the means of remedying the inconveniences arising therefrom, and to report thereon, with their observations and opinions, and to the House, together with the minutes of the evidence taken before them. (Ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, June 1, 1818, eight folio pages.)

3. Minutes of evidence taken before the same committee from the 18th of March, 1818, to the 7th of May of the same year, presented to the House of Commons, with the report, June 1, 1818, and ordered by the House to be printed, (two hundred and four folio pages.)

Mr. B. said that his object in moving to have these papers printed, and a large number circulated, was, in the first place, to diffuse among the agricultural classes of the United States the information contained in them, and which, in their present form, was inaccessible to them. He knew of but one copy in the United States, and that was in a volume belonging to the library of Congress. His second object in view was to lay the foundation for a bill, hereafter to be introduced, for the total repeal of the salt duty. He had shown these reports to several members of the Senate, who concurred with him in the opinion that the information they contained would be to the agricultural interest the most valuable present that could be made by Congress; and large as the number was that he proposed to have printed, he thought he might venture to say in advance that every Senator would have applications for more copies than would fall to his share. With this explanation, he would move for the printing of the largest number ever yet ordered by the Senate, his object being that the information should go not only to every county in every State, but to every neighborhood in every county. Mr. B. then moved to fill the blank with thirty thousand, so as to provide for the printing of thirty thousand copies. His own opinion was that fifty thousand would not be too many.

On taking the question, Mr. BENTON's motion was carried without a division.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to consider and report upon the expediency of constructing fortifications, or establishing other defenses at important and exposed points on the maritime frontier of the State of Maine, especially at Portland harbor, at the entrance of Kennebec river, and at the narrows of the Penobscot river; and that they consider the subject with reference to the claim of that State to an equal and just participation with the other States of the Union in the benefits of the system of national defense embraced within the constitutional duties of this Government; and more especially with reference to the existing controversy, so greatly prolonged, in which the territorial rights of Maine are involved, a large portion of her territory having been usurped by a foreign Power, and being now held in subjection thereto; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the same committee further consider, with reference to the same subject of controversy, and the right which every State has, under the Federal Constitution, to protection for its territory from foreign aggression, whether any, and what, further provisions are necessary to be made for the security of the inland frontier of Maine and the staying of encroachments; with leave to report as aforesaid.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill to change the location of the office of surveyor general for the district composed of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois;

The bill to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes; and

The bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act providing for her admission into the Union, for the purpose of making a road or roads leading to said State.

SALE OF LEAD MINES.

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause the reserved lead mines in the State of Illinois and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa to be sold as other public lands, being on its third reading.

Mr. MERRICK rose, and expressed his doubts whether the bill, in its present shape, would not subject the mineral public lands to the operation of the preemption laws. In his opinion, this bill would have that effect; but as there existed doubts on the subject, he suggested whether it would not be better to insert an amendment to obviate any such difficulty. As no amendment, however, could be made at this stage of the proceedings, he must, therefore, move a reconsideration of the vote on the question of engrossment, unless, indeed, the Senate would by unanimous consent insert the proposed amendment.

Mr. LINN thought the Senator from Maryland was entirely mistaken in the construction he had given to this bill. He (Mr. L.) himself would be glad to have the right of preemption applied to these mineral lands, for he believed it injurious to the interests of the States in which they were situated that they should continue in this way in the possession of the Government, which was deriving a miserable revenue from them by leasing them out to individuals. We were anxious (said Mr. L.) that they should be sold to individuals who, with their capital, would penetrate the bowels of the earth and bring forth its wealth; and while thus enriching themselves, add to the population and resources of the State. This bill, however, did not give the right of preemption, for it could not, if it did pass this and the other House; and, consequently, the friends of the measure were willing that these lands should be put up to the highest bidder.

Mr. MERRICK did not coincide in the views of the Senator from Missouri as to the policy of preemption rights attaching the mineral lands by persons who had established themselves on them without the sanction of law; nor was he satisfied that the provisions of the bill under consideration might not be so construed as to bring these lands under the operation of the preemption act.

Mr. LINN replied, that the Senator from Maryland had forgotten the provisions of the preemption law, which expressly excluded from its operations all mineral lands and all lands reserved for any purpose whatever. If the gentleman would take up that law and carefully examine its provisions, all his doubts would be removed.

Mr. MERRICK here read some extracts from the preemption law, for the purpose of showing that under the wording of this bill the mineral lands would not be excluded from the right of preemption.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, thought the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] was mistaken in his view of the subject. The preemption gave no right whatever to preemptions on the mineral lands. The Senator will see, by turning his attention to the bill, that its phraseology is wholly at variance with the idea that any preëmptioner can have the right of entry under its provisions. [Mr. CLAY here read extracts from the preemption law in support of his argument.] He was warmly in favor of the bill, and had no doubt it would be greatly to the advantage of Government, as well as to the tract of country in which these lands are situated, if these lands were disposed of to individuals. If the present mode of working them was not arrested, they would in a short time be wholly valueless to Government.

Mr. WALKER observed that the motion of the Senator from Maryland presented the extraordinary idea that a mere declaration of Congress can establish the fact whether a right does or does not exist under a previous law. Either the right of preemption (said Mr. W.) to these lands does or does not exist under the preemption law of the last session. If it does, it could not be taken away by the present law; and if it does not, surely no preemption right could be found in the provisions of this bill. So far from it, the lands were to be proclaimed for public sale as other lands of the United States, and in a manner wholly different from those sold under preemptions. Instead of providing for preemptions, the bill provided against them. It declared that the lands shall be proclaimed for six months, and under that proclamation they should be offered for sale; after which, and not before, they may be subject to private entry. The motion of the Senator from Maryland presented the extraordinary spectacle, that where this bill did not, by any rule of construction, allow the right of preemption, there should be a reconsideration, for the purpose of introducing an amendment to exclude such right—an amendment altogether inapplicable to the case before them. If the gentleman would look at the preemption law with more care, he would find that mineral lands, as well as lands reserved for any purpose whatever, are excluded from the operation of that law. It surely could not for a moment be maintained that any preemption right was given by this bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, had no doubt of the beneficial tendency of the bill, but thought that in order to guard against misconstruction there was a necessity for adopting the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Maryland. He was in favor of that course of legislation which left as little as possible for construction. The proposed amendment, if adopted, could do no injury. It would be the safer mode to reconsider the vote, and, by adopting the amendment, place the matter beyond doubt.

Mr. MERRICK said that he had never meant to convey the idea that either of the Senators intended that the bill should include preemption rights. His only object was to guard against such a construction being given to it. He was very willing that the necessary amendment should be made, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, and would withdraw his motion conditionally for that purpose.

Mr. LINN would say one word to the gentleman from Maryland, to correct an error into which he had fallen, in stating that these miners went on the public lands without law. This was a very great mistake. The Government of the United States had, through their agents, from time to time, invited individuals on these lands, for the purpose of mining, in order that it might derive a revenue from them. This was the way in which that beautiful region of Iowa and Wisconsin was opened to settlement and cultivation. With respect to this bill, he did not believe it would have been judicious to insert the right of preemption, otherwise he would gladly have seen it done. He knew that the construction given by the Department to the act of the last session was exceedingly rigid, and excluded from preemption all the lands in the mining regions, and that this construction had been extended to all the land offices.

Mr. NILES made a few observations, in which he expressed the apprehension that this act might be so construed as to give the right of preemption, and read a few extracts from the act of the last session, which he compared with the present act, in support of the position assumed by him. As no gentleman present intended that this act should confer the right of preemption, he thought that there ought to be no objection to the insertion of an amendment to prevent any difficulty on the subject.

Mr. KING observed that the subject was taken up just before he came into the Senate, and he had not, therefore, heard the first part of the debate. His honorable friend, however, who had just taken his seat, [Mr. NILES] was mistaken when he supposed that the mineral lands were subject to the preemption laws. All the reservations of the Government were so protected by general regulations that no preemptions of them could be obtained—commencing from 1829–30, up to the present time. With regard to the amendments proposed to this bill, he did not believe that it was necessary; he did not believe that any settler could avail himself of it so as to obtain a preemption; but he was not disposed to throw any obstacle in the way of making that more clear which some gentlemen considered doubtful. He was willing to adopt such an amendment as would leave no room for such a construction as gentlemen apprehended.

Mr. WALKER called the attention of the Senate, and particularly of his friend from Connecticut, to another portion of the act of the last session, which expressly excluded preemptions from these lands. Mr. W. here read the following extract:

"And provided always, That this act shall not be so construed as to give the right of preemption to any person or persons in consequence of any settlement or improvement made before the extinguishment of the Indian title to the land on which such settlement or improvement was made, &c., or to any sections or fractions of sections included within the location of any incorporated town, or to other alternate sections granted to the use of any canal or railroad or other public improvement on the route of such canal or railroad or other public improvement, or to any portions of public lands, surveyed or otherwise, which have been actually selected as sites for cities or towns, lotted into smaller quantities than eighty acres, and settled upon and occupied for the purposes of trade, and not of agricultural cultivation or improvement, or to any lands specially occupied or reserved for town lots or other purposes, by the authority of the United States."

Now, (said Mr. W.) if we look at the acts of Congress, it will be found that several of them have been passed specially reserving these lands to be leased; and therefore these lands, having been specially reserved, are excluded under the construction very properly given by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the preemption laws never were intended to apply to them. The case being so very clear, he could not consent to receive the amendment.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, appealed to his friend from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] as some Senators appeared to have doubts on the subject, to assent to a proviso that would remove all the difficulties suggested. He thought that two lines would accomplish this object, and he had accordingly drawn up an amendment, which he hoped might be taken by general consent.

Mr. C. then submitted the following:

Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to give the right of preemption in any case whatever.

Mr. LYON observed that he would certainly make no objection to this or any other amendment which gentlemen thought necessary to render the bill more clear in its exclusion of preemption rights. He would observe, however, that he was in favor of giving this right, and was about, when the bill was ordered to be engrossed, to object to it because it excluded preemptions. He knew men who had spent many years of their lives, and ten or fifteen thousand dollars of their capital, in improving these mineral lands, who would, if the bill became a law, have to enter into competition with other purchasers for their own improvements. He thought the claims of these persons very strong, and much regretted that no provision was made for them.

Mr. L., after a few more observations, referred to the act of 1830 and the act of the last session, for the purpose of showing that no preemption right existed as to mineral lands.

Mr. NILES expressed his doubts whether the proviso would effect the object in view.

No amendment being in order but by unanimous consent, and Mr. WALKER objecting to the one just offered, the question was then taken on reconsidering the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed, and it was carried without a division.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, then renewed his motion to amend, and the proviso submitted by him was read.

Mr. CALHOUN gave it as his opinion that it would be better to put such a proviso in the bill as to prevent the possibility of any such construction being given to it by the officers of the Government as to allow of preemptions under it. He did not believe that the bill conferred any such right; but as the lands were valuable, every means would be employed to bring them within the preemption laws; the ablest lawyers would be engaged, and every sort of machinery brought to bear to induce the Treasury officers to give such a construction as would open them to preemption claims.

Mr. ROBINSON thought that the bill bore hardly on those interested in mining operations. A great many of these persons had made large expenditures in working the mines, and were as much entitled to relief as any other settlers on public lands. The idea of the miners, as well as he could understand it, was that each individual should have a preemption right to that portion which he worked, and this in no case exceeded ten acres. The difficulty of making these small divisions alone, induced him to consent to the passage of the bill.

The question was then taken on the proviso of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, and it was adopted with a slight modification.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and by unanimous consent passed as amended.

The bill for the relief of the corporate authorities of the city of Mobile.

After the consideration of executive business, The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 23, 1838.

Immediately after the reading of the Journal, Mr. HAYNES rose, and asked the House now to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the President's message.

But, at the request of Mr. WISE, Mr. H. withdrew his motion for the present.

PUBLIC DEFAULTERS.

Mr. WISE then, on leave given, offered a motion to print twenty thousand copies extra of Documents Nos. 111 and 297 of the 2d session of the 25th Congress, (both being documents in relation to public defaulters.)

Mr. CURTIS hoped the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] would modify his motion, so as to include ten thousand extra copies of the report from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout.

Mr. WISE modified his motion accordingly.

Mr. DE GRAFF suggested twenty thousand copies of this latter document, and Mr. WISE again modified his motion accordingly.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that, as he presumed the gentleman from Virginia wished to have documents printed of five or six hundred pages, which Mr. C. thought it was very doubtful whether any one would read, he hoped that they would be printed separately.

Mr. WISE said he had no objection, it being his desire to have them so printed.

Mr. BOND moved that the printing be done in such order that the documents having reference to the same persons might appear consecutively.

Mr. WISE hoped the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOND] would suffer the printing to be secured in the first instance. The document read the other night in relation to public defaulters, was printed in such a manner as to present the idea, at first sight, that the Secretary of the Treasury had been very active, very energetic indeed, in keeping the public officers to their duty; but when the letters to certain individuals (Harris and Boyd) came to be examined, it was found, that so far from putting the spurs up to the rowels in the sides of public defaulters, he had only been writing them letters of supplication. He hoped Mr. B. would withdraw his motion.

Mr. BOND, after expressing his opinion, that before the printing, the Secretary should be called upon to state whether all the documents were genuine or not, consented to do so.

So the last mentioned motion was withdrawn.

Mr. CRARY inquired of the Chair if there was not a resolution in force requiring that each member of the House be furnished with copies of the Executive communications of the last session? On receiving an answer in the affirmative, he said that he considered it to be his duty to object to the printing called for by the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] One of the documents mentioned had been printed for the use of the members, and an extra number for distribution. The other document had been published for the use of the members, and information of its contents had gone to the people through them. Besides, Mr. C. objected that it was unjust to send forth the document containing the long list of public defaulters, when the accounts of many of them had since been adjusted. To do so would be to spread false information. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] would specify any particular document, the printing of which was requisite, he would go for it.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said he could readily agree with the gentleman from Michigan, that there had been on many occasions, and particularly in recent years, great extravagance in the expenditure of public money for printing. But it by no means followed that all expense for printing was extravagant. He would discriminate as to the objects of the expense, retrenching in cases where the object was not so much to inform the public mind by bringing it into direct acquaintance with facts, as to bias it by opinions and arguments in favor of particular theories or views of individuals or parties. Enormous expense had been legalized in this and in the other part of the Capitol, for publication of arguments of committees or public functionaries, in the shape of reports, wherein facts were assumed without sufficient evidence, or too highly colored, and made subservient to a particular design. He would instance, also, the President's annual message as a paper upon the printing of which, without the accompanying documents, far too much of the public money was periodically expended. The number ordered to be printed was always, in his opinion, unnecessarily large. That paper, in the form usually given to it, could hardly be called a document, in the appropriate and strict sense of that term. It was rather a commentary upon facts communicated in it, than the original and simple evidence of facts. The largest portion of it was sure to be an argument, drawn up, generally, with great ability and care, sometimes with great art and adroitness, intended to impress upon the public mind the particular opinions and views, and, perhaps, also to advance in public estimation, the particular cause, prospects, or hopes, of the individual author. But the very interest which it necessarily excited—the eager and impatient interest with which it was expected by the whole country—insured for it, without the aid of Congress or of the public purse, the earliest and most extensive publication. Before the reading can be half finished in this Hall, it is gone miles away, flying forth in every direction, upon the swiftest wings of fiery expedition, to every portion, populous or waste, of the vast Republic. It is reprinted at every press, and read at the most distant firesides, long before the extra copies ordered by this House reach our desks.

To these and to other like subjects of expense, let the gentleman apply his economy and retrenchment, and thus save and secure a liberal fund for furnishing the people with information and evidence, instead of argument and opinion; with facts, instead of theories and projects; with such original, undistorted, and authentic proofs of facts and transactions of the highest interest as are contained in the documents which are the subject of the present motion. In this course he would cordially coöperate. But he could not but feel surprise and regret that there should be, in any quarter, or in any portion of this House—particularly in that portion from which the opposition seemed about to come—an objection to giving to the people the naked, ungarlished truths contained in these documents. Whence did these documents come? From a high Department of our Government; originated in that Department, and authenticated by its head. They were not only the best evidence of transactions on which the people had a right to be truly informed, but the two most important documents were in truth the very transactions themselves. This was the sort of information which it was not only expedient and proper that the representatives of the people should furnish, and which they were expected to furnish to their constituents; but which it was the right of their constituents to have, and which it was necessary they should have to enable them to form a true judgment of the doings and intentions of those whom they intrust with power, and to act correctly in the performance of their own civil duties, and the exercise of their own civil rights. Here were the acts and proceedings of their public functionaries, whole and ungarbled and undistorted, uncolored by declamation, undisguised by sophistry, going directly and naked to the mind, the intelligence of the nation, with all their original motives, modifications, and objects fresh upon them. Why should they be suppressed? They were of the highest interest to all who feel an interest in the administration of that vast Executive power which, legitimately or illegitimately, for good or evil, is exercised and brought to bear upon all the concerns of society. They related to the Executive management of the finances and the patronage of the nation; to the wielding of that power of powers, the money power, which, in hands that know its potency and its appliances, overreaches, subsidizes, and controls all other powers. Now, it could not be disguised that genuine, perfect, unsophisticated information of the acts of public servants, from the highest to the lowest, was the great want of the freemen of this country. It was of the utmost importance for the safety of their free institutions, and for the security of their means of life and happiness, that they should have it. Their representatives were intrusted with the power and means of furnishing them with it, and it seemed to him that this was a most fit occasion for exercising that power.

He would not now comment upon the contents of the documents, or what was proved by them, nor anticipate, at this time, the judgment which the public mind, if allowed to receive them whole and entire, without bias or sophistication, would pronounce upon the transactions disclosed in them. It was sufficient that they were the sort of information which every citizen of a Republic was bound to obtain, if possible, and to digest and pronounce upon according to the dictates of his unbiased intelligence and integrity. Let it be remembered, too, that these documents could not or would not be published whole and perfect by any newspaper press. They would be assorted, selected, and confused. The genuineness of some would be denied, the force of others would be disguised; they would be robbed of their genuine power over the mind by being brought in, in detached and imperfect portions, as aids to an argument in support of some particular view. All the benefit of the mutual explanations they afford, of the interpretation of one paper or transaction by another in the same series, would be lost to the public, and the speech or the essay would embody only such as might be made subservient to its particular design. He trusted there was no portion of this House that would avow a desire to withhold from the people such important proofs of facts, until they could be made to pass through the menstium of such processes as these; and he therefore hoped that the objection to the printing would not be further pressed.

Mr. WISE said he should have thought no objection would have been made by any member of the Administration party to the printing of a document which had the name and authority of the Department itself for the information it contained. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] said we should throw out false information. If false, it was the handiwork of the Secretary himself.

But suppose that some individuals had since settled their accounts: did that alter the fact? Or could it be said that false information was spread abroad, when the document itself would show that the Secretary himself had connived at the defalcations? If the documents had emanated from the members of the Whig party—the Federal Bankites, as they were called—he should have expected that opposition would have been made; but coming from whence it did, what objection could be made? Were gentlemen afraid of their own documents? Were they afraid of their own reports? The gentleman from Michigan said that to print this document, filed here from the Department itself, and to distribute twenty thousand copies among the people, was worse than the defalcation itself. This was the old cry. It seemed that one of the party, at least, had nerve enough to take the ground assumed in 1836—that it would be actual fraud to publish information in regard to those who were not defaulters. That was not what he was after. What he wanted was to publish to the world the manner in which the Secretary himself had performed his duty. He could file articles of impeachment this day, not only that the Secretary was guilty of gross neglect, but of corrupt neglect. He could show not less than twenty specifications for articles of impeachment in this very document, if the House would entertain them, and if the Senate would try the impeachment. Give us light; not the light of my speeches, but the light which is to be found in your own documents. I will try you out of your own mouth, and, in the language of Scripture, you are already condemned to your own consciences, like an old and hardened sinner, without the law. You cannot withhold this information, which you yourselves have sent to the House.

Mr. BOON said it was a little singular that no subject could be introduced into this House without a most violent attack being made on the Administration. He understood that the document which gentlemen were now desirous to have republished, had been published heretofore and thrown out to the country.

Mr. WISE was understood to say that it had only been printed for the members, not for the special information of the people.

Mr. BOON said it was enough that it had gone to the people through their Representatives on this floor. What proportion would twenty or fifty thousand copies bear to the aggregate amount of the dear people of this country, for whom certain persons in this Hall professed so tender a regard for particular purposes? Here was to be another item of extravagance set down. He was one of the friends of the Administration, and he was not afraid that any and everything should go to the people whom he had the honor to represent; they had heard the truth before now. But he was not prepared to go for such a wasteful expenditure of the public money as was here proposed.

Mr. CRARY repeated that one of the documents would not furnish correct information to the people. It was known that some persons had there been put down as defaulters who, at the time, had vouchers in their hands more than covering the amount charged against them. Many of them had since been settling up from quarter to quarter. The document, therefore, did not set forth the facts. In order to give correct information, it would be necessary to call on the Department to know who had settled their accounts, and what was the actual condition of the accounts of individuals at the present time. As to being afraid to send forth documents to the people, he had no fear of the kind. He cared not how many documents were printed, if their publication was needed. His constituents did not ask of him to furnish them with stale and gone-by information. They wanted information of things as they existed at the present time.

He had been charged with wearing the party collar of 1836. Notwithstanding the charge, he would be found as ready as the gentleman from Virginia to vote for the impeachment of any officer of the Government, on being satisfied of his guilt. Let the gentleman produce his evidence, and not be continually crying "peculation, peculation!" The House had long ago heard enough of this cry. They ought now to be furnished with the evidence to support it, if there was any in existence. He had no doubt there were peculators; we have always had them; but they were not more guilty of a dereliction of duty than would be the majority of the House, if they voted for the motion before them.

Mr. THOMPSON said that, since he had held a seat on this floor, he never before remembered an instance in which the prominent men of the party had refused to print the largest number of a document, not emanating from the Opposition, but from the party themselves, and a Department of the Government. The Opposition had long stood in this position, that the only light which they could get was dragged forth, extorted from the public functionaries of the country. All we want is light. If ever the prayer of Ajax—"Give us, great God, but light!"—were applicable to the condition of any party, it is so here in reference to the Opposition. Give us light, and victory and triumph await that party.

What is the objection made to this document? It is, that it is stale. Probably it may be so; probably it is obsolete; probably peculation will now be acknowledged to be, as it is in truth, the order of the day; and honor and integrity are obsolete. If they are not obsolete, there are facts contained in this document which never can become so. There is one single fact in that document the publication of which, looking to it even in a pecuniary point of view, is worth hundreds and thousands of dollars. What is it? It is that on which so much stress has been laid by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] and previously by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] that, whilst your President now with alacrity rushes not only upon Swartwout, but upon his securities, by a summary process, almost, if not quite, in violation of the Constitution, the Secretary of the Treasury has, in another instance, permitted the law to slumber from day to day, and from year to year, with the knowledge of the most gross peculations—not peculations simply; that is too soft a term for such flagrant dishonesty. Take the case given yesterday, where a man puts down to himself public lands as sold when they had not been sold, and then has not the honesty to pay even that small modicum with which he has charged himself.

But there are collateral enormities in all these acts. The act which the President says deserves nothing less than the ignominious punishment of a felon is not only connived at, but a premium offered for it. Here is a man whom the Secretary has been supplicating, not dismissing with the prompt indignation which ought to have followed such proceedings, but supplicating from day to day to give up the money which he had taken; and yet this very man was reappointed after the perpetration of repeated acts which the President now says ought to be made felony. Let the people have the facts. The people of this country are honest at the core. Give them light; let them see that their functionaries have done thus and thus, and my life upon the result.

But this document is stale. When did it become stale? It never can be stale until corruption prevails all over the land. Here are men convicted of frauds, who are not only tolerated, but are reappointed to office. I say in sincerity, that I believe, if the people will submit to acts of this kind, they are no longer capable of self-government. They are no longer fit to be free, for they are no longer honest. The gentleman says there are excusatory facts. I only speak of facts as they are here presented. But suppose it should turn out that these men are not defaulters: what does that matter? The Government thought that they were so, when they trusted them again. They thought they were speculators, and reappointed and continued them; that they had been guilty of offenses worthy the ignominious punishment of a felon, and yet they were reappointed. Still, if there are excusatory facts, let gentlemen bring them out; I will go for the publication of an equal number of all such documents, and I will send one of them to each man to whom I may transmit one containing the damning facts set forth in this present document.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] seemed to take it for granted that the friends of the Administration were all opposed to the printing of the documents.

Mr. THOMPSON gave some sign of dissent. Mr. CAMBRELENG said, the gentleman said so.

Mr. THOMPSON said his remarks must have been misunderstood, as he certainly had not made that assertion. What he had said was, that this was the first instance, within his experience, in which the prominent members of an Administration party had refused to print a public document. He did not know, and could not know, that all the members of that party would vote to refuse. He supposed, on the contrary, that they might divide, as on other occasions.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was glad the gentleman qualified his remark. I concur with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] in the necessity of publishing an extra number of these documents; not, however, in the necessity of publishing them all, because I hope that, before one of the documents is printed it will be referred to a committee, to examine and see what parts are requisite for publication, and that we shall not do as we did two years ago, publish a libel upon dead men—men who have produced their vouchers, and settled their accounts.

Mr. WISE. Who was the author of that libel?

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I concur in the opinion that that document never should have come from the Department without explanatory documents.

Mr. WISE. The Secretary was the author of that libel, if a libel it was.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. The document was furnished in obedience to a resolution—was specially called for. But the other document contains information of an entirely nominal character. One half the individuals there implicated are dead men, and others have brought their vouchers, and yet we have been publishing the document annually. If the Secretary did publish it, it was under an ancient act of Congress, requiring the annual publication. Nominal defaulters should not be punished as actual defaulters. Allow me here to say to those gentlemen who seem so sensitive about the case of Mr. Swartwout, that the public may imagine that they mean, by raising up the ghosts of dead men for forty years past, to cover up the last fraud of one of their own friends. I will say that I commiserate, as much as any man, the case of Mr. Swartwout. I ascribe his case, as I do all such, to that favorite credit system of theirs, which, in other words, is the gambling system. This is the source of all the degradation in morals and character which we now witness. To this system, I say, gentlemen may trace all these evils. But I shall not now go into that question.

Mr. WISE desired to correct the gentleman from New York in one fact. The gentleman speaks, and I understand the whole secret of it, with a view to throw the Opposition party in this House into the attitude of defending Mr. Swartwout, and says that he commiserates that individual as much as I or any other gentleman. Now I want the gentleman and all his party to understand that I have no commiseration with Mr. Swartwout. I hold him in utter contempt—in utter detestation—as a dishonest public officer, who was retained in office by the Secretary of the Treasury with full means of knowing his dishonesty, and without any disposition on the part of the Secretary to do his duty, and bring the defaulter to punishment. I appeal to the ghosts of no dead men. My appeal is to the living—the living who now walk abroad unscathed, unwhipped of justice, through the whole length and breadth of this land. My business is with the living, not the dead. Let them rest in their graves; I shall not disturb their repose.

Mr. THOMPSON said that he also disclaimed all sympathy with Mr. Swartwout. He entirely approved of the course of the Administration in relation to his defalcations. But he wanted to contrast their present course with that previously adopted by them.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] will pardon me. I mean to say that I feel as much sympathy with the case of Mr. Swartwout as I do with the case of the poor smuggler. When we make laws contrary to the rights of man, if the smuggler should be taken and hanged, I should be more prone to desire that the law-maker himself should be hanged rather than the smuggler. I do say that those who are in favor of laws which will bring upon the country such evils as these are as responsible to the country as the individual who commits the fraud; and when some poor man becomes the victim, the gentleman from Virginia will pardon me if my impulse of humanity goes ahead of his. The case of Mr. Swartwout I regard as of the most flagrant character, and deserving of the severest reprobation; but, at the same time, I cannot avoid looking at the cause of this whole system, of the demoralizing tendency of which we have such abundant evidences. But, sir, we shall have ample time to go into this question, and to trace all these ruinous speculations in lands and stocks to the right source—the credit system. I am willing that all the defalcations should be published as much as gentlemen please, because I believe that the more we multiply copies of them, the more satisfied will the people become that the law which was before us the session before last and the last session, and which has again been reported, ought to have been the law from 1789 down to the present time. I believe that if the law now reported had been the law of the land Mr. Swartwout never could have escaped detection, and that he never would have been a defaulter. All I ask of gentlemen is to read the provisions of the bill, and see whether they are not the only provisions which can be adopted to prevent similar defalcations.

Mr. REED said that he well recollected to have heard the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] a few days previous to the close of the last session of Congress, and after the signal defeat of the sub-Treasury bill, boast loudly that the sub-Treasury was in operation, and would continue to be until 1840—he added “in spite of the lamentations here and elsewhere.” And now the private and public losses and evils we have suffered, and even the frauds and defalcations of public officers, are charged to the Opposition—to us of the minority.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the remark of the gentleman afforded him an opportunity of stating what his opinion was in relation to the law of the land as now existing. His opinion was that, since the suspension of specie payments, the deposit act of 1836 had become null and void, and that the last clause of the eighth section revived the act of 1789, which was the only act organizing the Treasury Department, and by which the keeping of the public moneys was made the express duty of the Treasurer of the United States. Under that act the Treasurer was the exclusive keeper of the public money, and nothing but gold or silver was receivable in payment of public dues. The latter had, however, been subsequently modified by the joint resolution of 1816, and the act of 14th July, 1836, tolerating the receipt of bank notes conditionally.

Mr. REED. The statement and explanation

now given by the gentleman does not at all change the facts. The statement of the gentleman which I have alluded to, made here last session, and which is not denied, no man in this House can have forgotten. We were then assured, and the country was assured, by that gentleman that the sub-Treasury was then in operation, and would continue to be until 1840, in spite of us. Is it not in operation? Did not President Jackson “take the responsibility,” and make it known to Congress and the country, that the Secretary of the Treasury and all the subordinate officers of the Treasury Department were subject to his control?

The gentleman charges the speculations and overtrading monopolies, and even the frauds and defalcations of public officers, to the minority. Have the minority made your laws? Have they appointed your collectors and district attorneys, (Swartwout, Price, &c.,) and your land receivers? We are, at this late day, called upon by the President to aid in detecting and punishing defaulters. The great defaulters are far beyond our reach, and we shall probably search in vain for the vast amount of money they have fraudulently taken from the sub-Treasury. If the President would save the money of the people, he should appoint men honest and capable for custom-house officers and land receivers. And the Treasury Department should require them to render a strict account of their stewardship, and their accounts should be rendered frequently and intelligibly. Then, if frauds were attempted, they would soon be detected, and, under a proper supervision, could never be practiced, as they have been under our new system for years, and to an alarming amount. But the gentleman informs us that these losses are the result of a gambling system, and that certain politicians are responsible for the consequences. Who are they? Who have had the power and control of the Government for ten years past? Has it not been in the hands of the gentleman himself and his friends? Should they not be held responsible for their own measures and the conduct of their own officers?—their own sub-Treasury operations?

Although I differ entirely from the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] as to his argument upon responsibility, I entirely agree with him as to the propriety of printing the documents proposed by the motion we are now considering. They will afford most important information to the people, and they will demand it at the present time. It will show them what has been done, and what has been left undone in the appointment of fit men to take care of the Treasury. It will show how they have been treated by the Executive, and what care has been taken of the public money.

It may, and I trust will, attract the attention of the Government and people, and be the means of saving a part, at least, of what otherwise might be lost, of what yet remains, and of that which may hereafter come into the Treasury. I confess, I have heard the objection of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] with surprise. He objects on account of the expense of printing. The expense, at most, can be but small, and it must be ill-judged economy to refuse a few dollars expense when we may hope by such means to save millions of the money of the country from being swept away by miserable and unprincipled defaulters.

It is objected by several gentlemen that, if one of the documents named is published, it will be most cruel and unjust to the memory of the dead and the living, inasmuch as, by the books of the Treasury, some appear to be defaulters who are not so in reality. The books of the Treasury (if not burnt) must remain, whether published or not; and had I a friend or ancestor who appeared to be a defaulter, and who was not so in reality, I should thank the Government for publishing it, that it might attract attention, that the accounts might be settled and balanced, and justice done to his memory. Nothing is asked to be published but recorded truth.

The publications desired for ourselves and the people are facts. Facts from the Treasury Department itself. Facts which the people should know at this time; suffering, as they do, from the most ruinous and profligate defalcations. Facts which may have a most important bearing upon public opinion, and may yet have an influence upon ourselves. Under such circumstances, let those alone refuse the publication who fear the effect of the light of truth.

Mr. LOOMIS said that he deemed the resolution an extraordinary one; it was for the reprinting of documents which have been called for by the House, printed by its order, and laid on the tables of all the members at the last session; it could not, therefore, be for the information of members. A large extra number were also ordered by the House at the last session, and were distributed by the members to their constituents. The public were in possession of this information. In this state of the case, there must be some very good reason to induce him to consent to select this document, an edition of twenty thousand copies, equal to the largest number ever ordered of the most interesting and important documents of the present session; but that this document of all others should be selected, was most extraordinary. He well recollected that when one of these documents was published, complaints were heard from the press, in all parts of the country, of the great injustice done private individuals. Many persons had been exhibited to the public as defaulters who in reality were not so. A balance stood against them on the books of the Treasury. Some of them had lost their vouchers, and could not, therefore, have the books balanced, though everybody was satisfied they were not defaulters. Some, through inadvertence or inability, have not had their disbursements formally allowed and credited on the books of the Department; others were long since dead. Sir, the complaint was well founded. The House had no right to inflict pain unnecessarily, to do injustice to individuals. It is said that they want light and truth. Then let them call for information, and I will go with them. If they wish to know the present state of the books, let them call for that; their condition last year they have heard—they can refer to it in their speeches, publish it in the newspapers, and make use of it in any and every way they choose for electioneering purposes; but if they wanted the truth, if light was their object, why not call for it? Why not take the state of things as they now exist? If injustice was done to individuals by the publication of the balances on the books as then existing, and which balances some of the individuals concerned may since then have had corrected, why insist on republishing an unjust, erroneous statement, whose only use must be for electioneering purposes, and by which the House would again perpetuate a great wrong? For one, he could not be driven to vote for the expenditure of the public money for such purposes, by any apprehension that he should be charged with suppressing light. Sir, I move to amend the resolution, by striking out all that part which relates to the documents of last session.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS. It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to address the House. My object is simply to make a motion. Before I do so, sir, I wish to state, for the information of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that William M. Price, the associate and companion in guilt of Mr. Swartwout, is an acknowledged Loco-foco; and on the eve of the gentleman's election, at Tammany Hall Mr. Price made, as I am informed, an able speech in favor of the “Independent” sub-Treasury scheme. He succeeded, to the entire satisfaction of the party, in proving that it would work in practice infinitely better than banks. This information is given as a set-off against the gentleman's fears that the Whigs might, perchance, be supposed to be defending a friend in the person of Samuel Swartwout, and for the additional purpose of relieving the gentleman's mind from the unpleasantness that must necessarily accompany such an unfounded belief. I move the previous question.

Mr. W. withdrew the demand on the request of Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, and on the pledge of that gentleman to renew it.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said he should vote for the publication of these documents. He had originally called for them; and to show the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] that he was unwilling to do injustice to any individual, he held in his hand a resolution which he proposed to offer as an amendment, and by which the Secretary of the Treasury was called upon to furnish a list not only of those whose accounts had been adjusted, but also a list of defaulters, up to the 1st of October. His proposition was in the following words:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House—

1. What defalcations by collectors and receivers, or other depositaries of the public money, have taken place since the 1st day of October, 1837, the names of the defaulters, when and where they took place, and what amount.

2. What amount has been paid, or what balances appearing due from defaulters, in the report of the 17th of January last, have been adjusted and reduced.

Mr. WISE accepted the above as a modification of his motion, which he again further modified by adding:

And that he be requested to report to this House all the correspondence touching defalcations of receivers and collectors of public money since the Department furnished document No. 297.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. LOOMIS,

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, resumed. He would not go into an argument, as he was under pledge to renew the demand for the previous question. He certainly believed, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] had stated, that, in some instances, balances did appear against public agents who were not guilty. It was right and proper that corrections in such cases should be made. When they were made, they would accompany the present documents as they were sent out to the country, and then the country would know the whole system from head to foot, not only under the operation of the act of 1789, but of all the laws which had been subsequently passed. He desired that this information should go to the country, whether it illustrated the value of the sub-Treasury scheme, or whether it illustrated the contrary. He wanted the information to go to the people in the shape in which it was presented at the Treasury Department, exhibiting the facts, and leaving the people to draw their own inferences. It was a question of vital interest to them. It was now proposed to change the system of finance, as it had stood from 1789 up to the present hour. The good or the evil of the present scheme was to be illustrated by that best of all tests, experience. If these facts should go to show, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had stated, that the credit system was false, let it so appear; if the contrary, let it so appear, and let the people draw their inferences accordingly. It was important that the whole truth should go to the country, that it might receive, not the partisan, but the unbiased judgment of the people. Some gentlemen seemed to think that an extra number of these documents had already been printed. When the first report came in, a gentleman from New York moved the printing of five thousand extra copies; which were ordered. But of the second document no extra copies had been printed, it having been printed only for the use of the members. All he wanted was, to test the conflicting systems before the country. Gentlemen drew one conclusion, he drew another. He had taken his position, and he did not intend to retreat from it. Other gentlemen had taken theirs. Let, therefore, the whole facts go to the country, and let the people decide the question under the full blaze of light which those facts would shed. And for the purpose of probing those facts to the bottom, and developing the whole truth, he would go with gentlemen to any extent.

In accordance with his pledge, he renewed the demand for the previous question; but Mr. WILLIAMS having released him from the promise, the demand for the previous question was again withdrawn.

Mr. DUNCAN said, if he understood himself, he should be the last man to suppress the publication of anything that was calculated to enlighten the minds of the people; and, if he understood himself, he would be the last man to do anything having a tendency to cover the iniquity or the fraud of any officer in any department of the Government. But when had the House been out of the sound of charges against the Government of extravagance and profligacy? It was a standing charge. When the members of the Administration party voted to retrench, it was attributed to improper motives—to a desire to cover up the iniquity of the various departments of the Government—the demagogism—or to some sinister influence. He cared not what the question might be, with that end in view, it was at once and invariably met with a cry of corrupt motives.

Mr. D. alluded to the care and caution required for the protection of the public money, in the three readings of bills in both Houses, before a dollar could be expended; and yet gentlemen introduced a resolution to expend twenty, thirty, or forty thousand dollars to no purpose whatever, and that resolution was to be adopted in five minutes, and almost without a word being said. He hoped it would not be agreed to. He objected to its adoption, because no good could grow out of it, and because, as had been stated, the characters of innocent men would be injured; for there were some appearing as defaulters who were not so. To publish information of such a character would be to do an injustice which never could be remedied. The very least that could be done on behalf of those who might be injured, would be to refer the documents to a committee, to see what portions ought, in justice, to be published.

He would move, however, to lay the whole subject on the table. But Mr. D. withdrew the motion, at the request of several gentlemen.

Mr. BRONSON, after alluding to the manner in which these documents had severally been published at the last session of Congress, by order of the House, and to the injustice which one of these documents had inflicted, expressed himself opposed to the motion to reprint.

Mr. MENEFE said he was happy to witness such scenes as this in the House of Representatives. He could perceive a feverish anxiety in the party in power, which indicated that, after all the enormities which had come to light, there were other and greater still behind. Hence the anxiety to stifle debate, and quench the light which was beginning to be shed on dark transactions long hidden from the public eye. After the proof had come of iniquity after iniquity, which had been plunged like avalanches from the heights of power into the pure lake of our republican institutions, now that liberty was looking to this House for help, now came a solemn trade in the Globe against wasting time in this most villainous debate, and an appeal to the liege subjects of the throne at once to put a stop to it; and, while such intimations came from the official organ, simultaneously there was an effort within the House to smother documentary light. Mr. M., after some remarks on the increase of the public expenditures, and the use which had been made of the public money, said it was vain to hope for longer concealment; the deeds of the party were rushing to the light with the resistless force of destiny. The petty excuses of economy would not answer the purpose; they had lost their charm; the public began too well to understand the economy of this Administration. It might as well at once, with arms crossed and hearts resigned, come up to that bar, where the American people would pass on its deeds, and award their due recompense. That people would embody the iniquities of ten long years, and, placing them on the head of the victims, would stretch the sacrificial knife, and, calling on Heaven, would make one great expiatory offering to the god of liberty.

Mr. M. denied that the documents gave a false statement in relation to defaulters; they only stated what appeared on the record; this was all they professed to do, and this they did. These commencing groans of detected guilt were as nothing, they were mere whispers, yea, sweet sounds, in comparison to the outcries of national agony that would soon fill the air as the whole truth came to view. Come it must. Let it affect this party or that party, things had reached a point at which concealment was any longer hopeless. Whether these defaulters were or were not an argument against the sub-Treasury—let them be even the strongest argument in its favor—still the people must have the truth. The truth would go like a two-edged sword; error must get out of the way, or be cut in twain. Away with this pitiful talk about the expense of printing a document! Let the people be no longer insulted by an open attempt to stifle the light and hide the truth from them. Have it they would, and have it all.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, said he was as well pleased as the gentleman who had just taken his seat at witnessing the sensation in certain parts of this House at every fresh haul of truth from the great deep of this Administration's secrets. The great oyster bed had not been disturbed for years, now, and he did not doubt that another grab would bring upon water larger and fatter oysters than any which had yet been opened. Yes, there were other fine fish below, which had not yet been hooked up or speared. He was for trying all ways to get at them; lines, nets, spears, harpoons; any means and all means he was for trying, so that by some means the fish might be made to appear above water. He was happy to perceive, from some symptoms of compunction on the other side, that the party was not as yet "desperately wicked;" they were not judicially hardened; there was some little nucleus of moral principle, around which better feelings might yet cluster, so as to leave a hope that they might still be snatched as brands from the burning. He had begun to think that the skin of this Administration was like that of the rhinoceros, insensible to all attacks, and proof against the keenest dart; but he now began to have a better hope. The Globe might admonish and warn and entreat, but it was in vain; the Globe could not stop this debate on corruption. It would go on; the nation would hear it. Gentlemen did not like this word "corruption;" but if he thought their ears were not callous, he would buy a starling, and have it taught to cry nothing but "corruption!" He would find the Administration when it lay asleep, and in its ear he would halloo "corruption! corruption! corruption!" He would not, according to the advice of the gentleman from New York over the way, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] have the anatomical dissections confined to dead subjects; no, there were plenty of living ones whose imposthumes needed the knife. He trusted these documents would be published; he wanted them for two purposes: first for lessons of morality, and then as models of the King's English. His friend had said they would cut like a two-edged sword; ay, like a three-edged one.

Mr. ATHERTON said he merely rose to reply to a single remark made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS.] That gentleman had said he would continually cry out "corruption" against this Administration; nay, he would buy a starling which should be taught to speak nothing but "corruption, corruption." Mr. A. would make the reply, which was once made in the British Parliament on a similar occasion. The member of Parliament to whom he alluded, said in reply to a similar remark, that gentlemen need not trouble themselves to buy a starling for that purpose. For as long as they themselves kept continually uttering the same words, with just as much reason and meaning as the starling would have in uttering them, the words would produce, no doubt, just as much effect as if the starling himself should speak them.

Mr. THOMAS expressed a reluctance to prolong this desultory debate, and yet he must consent to do so, or to vote without having the reasons upon which his vote would be founded presented to the public. No one who had participated in the discussion had stated the considerations by which he was governed.

The question before the House was complex. It had a double aspect. The resolution originally presented called for the publication of certain documents. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] had moved an amendment to this resolution, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate further information concerning the defaults of public officers. This amendment has been accepted by the mover of the original resolution, and thus two questions, not necessarily connected, are blended in one proposition. A vote for or against this proposition could not be satisfactorily given. Many members, like himself, may be willing to call upon the Secretary for further information, and, nevertheless, be hostile to the passage of that part of this resolution authorizing the publication of twenty thousand copies of certain public documents. To relieve us from this embarrassment, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOOMIS] has proposed to strike out of this amended resolution all that part that relates to the publication of the documents, and for this proposed amendment Mr. T. was prepared to vote.

He was opposed to the publication designed to be made, and would give his reasons touching each document separately. This would be done regardless of denunciation or declamation from any quarter of the House. There is shrewdness and sagacity in the country sufficient to distinguish bold assertion and harsh invective from argument and proof. Instead of an attempt to show that the public interest required that this publication should be made, nearly the whole time of one class of speakers had been consumed in what looked very much like an effort to deter the friends of the Administration from voting for the amendment moved by the gentleman from New York. The Republican party, and the friends of the independence of the national Treasury of the banks of the States, it is said, dare not publish these documents; because they serve to illustrate the fallacy of the principles upon which the proposed separation of the Government and the banks is vindicated. This declaration has been made, and as often answered; and yet it is reiterated here. By what kind of reasoning do gentlemen form and cherish this most extraordinary opinion? Who are the public defaulters, a list of whose names is furnished in document No. 111? And when was the public money with which they were intrusted embezzled? The documents show that these depredations upon the public treasure commenced immediately after the Government was organized, and have continued under every Administration which has been in power. The public defaulters are not then confined to any one class of politicians. And the fact that public money has been misapplied by those who had it in charge under the late and present Administrations cannot, in itself, be fairly adduced in support of the charge that the executive branch of the Government is corrupt, or that it has failed to exercise due diligence in the execution of the laws. The truth is, that the source of this great public evil can be traced to unwise legislation. The laws intended to guard the public money are defective. The legislative branch of the Government is justly censurable for the loss of a large share of the money which has been properly organized, and until Congress becomes sensible of this, and undertakes coolly and deliberately to amend the existing laws instead of dealing daily in wholesale denunciations of those who have to administer them, the public money cannot be preserved from the plunderers by any vigilance that a Secretary of the Treasury can exercise.

Monstrous as this attempt was to throw upon the party in power the whole odium of these defalcations, commencing with and extending through the entire existence of the Government, must be considered by all fair and impartial men, it is exceeded in enormity by the pretense that the friends of an independent Treasury have cause to fear a publication of the documents illustrating those frauds. Who, sir, are the public defaulters? To what class of public officers do they belong? Some of them have been employed to collect your revenues from lands, customs, and other sources; and others have been appointed to pay out and expend the public money in pursuance of appropriations made by law. Does any party in this country propose to dispense with the agency of either class of these public functionaries? Has any member upon this floor yet made such a proposition? Let gentlemen come out and declare that we must have no individual agents responsible to the people of the United States to receive or disburse the public money. Let them say that the cashiers of the State banks shall exercise these functions of the Treasury Department. Let them bring in a bill to authorize the directors of certain State banks to appoint individual agents to collect and disburse the public moneys, instead of devolving that power upon the Chief Magistrate of the American people, and they can then, with some propriety, claim to be the projectors of a system not to be injuriously affected by the disclosures contained in the documents they propose to publish. Until that is done, in the names of justice and common sense, let us hear no more florid declamation about the annihilating effect of these defalcations upon the proposed separation of the Government and the banks. They cannot retard the progress of that great measure in public opinion; they must serve to quicken its march. Nearly all the money which has been lost was embezzled while banks were used as depositories of the public funds. Notwithstanding, those who wish to return to that system charge that its opponents are hostile to the publication of a document containing proof of that fact. There is not the slightest foundation for the charge. No member has signified a wish to withhold information from the people. Five thousand copies of the first document in the series contained in this resolution were published at the last session. It has been scrutinized and examined. It makes, all admit, erroneous impressions, doing great injustice to many worthy men. The names of individuals are upon it, as defaulters, who are known not to be indebted to the United States. The Secretary, in accordance with the resolution of Congress, has sent to us extracts from the books of the Department, showing large amounts charged to public officers who have, upon final settlement of their accounts, exhibited vouchers showing that every dollar in their hands has been properly applied. Such a document ought not to be republished. No fair man ought to desire a recirculation of these errors. In proof of his statement, Mr. T. referred to the name of Mr. McCulloch, late collector of the port of Baltimore, who stood charged with more than thirteen thousand dollars, although he had in his possession a receipt from the accounting officers in the Department, showing that he owed not a dollar. Other similar instances could be adduced.

Mr. WISE here modified his amendment by striking out the document No. 111 altogether; he wanted the two others to show that, without going one inch beyond the date of the present Administration, there had been not less than from fifty to sixty cases of defalcation during the incumbency of Mr. Taney and Mr. Woodbury. Mr. W. inquired whether the gentleman from Maryland would now vote for the resolution?

Mr. THOMAS said he could not. He objected to the publication of twenty thousand copies of document No. 297 at any time. It was very voluminous. It contained four hundred pages. Much of the correspondence in it was valueless, worthless. The circulation generally of such a document could be of but little service. The public money would be more advantageously employed in the printing for distribution of one single speech illustrating this correspondence, than in the publication of the document itself. By printing it we would furnish a lucrative job to the public printer, and do but little service to the public interest. He was opposed, therefore, to printing twenty thousand copies at any time, and he would not vote for the printing of any number of copies now. The document is imperfect. Before it is published, we should have from the Secretary of the Treasury further information. Mr. T. urged similar objections to the publication of document No. 13, relating to Swartwout's defalcation. He was in favor of referring that subject to a committee empowered to make a searching examination into that stupendous fraud, in all its ramifications. When that has been completed, the House could publish full information on that most important matter, and no man, he hoped, would be disposed to oppose the proceeding.

In conclusion, Mr. T. denied that he and those who acted with him desired to cover up or hide any of these defalcations. He was prepared to expose these plunderers of the public Treasury. But he would not be forced to vote for a resolution involving a useless and extravagant expenditure of public money, from an apprehension that by withholding his sanction from such a measure, he would subject himself to unworthy and unfounded imputations. He had the moral courage to obey the dictates of his own judgment on this or any other occasion; and he presumed that all other members would do likewise.

Mr. LEGARE rose to express his astonishment at what had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland. It was inconceivable to him that any gentleman should have serious objections to the printing of an important public document.

Mr. THOMAS said he had no objection to the printing of document No. 297, (the correspondence,) but was unwilling to vote for twenty thousand copies.

Mr. LEGARE said this somewhat diminished his astonishment, though it did not wholly remove it. For, without pretending to say on whose head the charges made would ultimately fall, or what would be the verdict of the public after seeing those documents, he must, with all due respect to the gentleman from Maryland, say that he had shown no good reason against the printing.

It was to him personally a matter of profound indifference whether one party or the other would be condemned for their shameful depredations on the public purse; it was of immense importance at the present moment that all the light should be shed on the public mind that could be brought to bear on the great subjects before the country. He was amazed at what he had heard. And was it, indeed, true that the country was so fallen, that if the Government were administered as it ought to be, men could not be found to fill public offices in whom the public could confide? He had hardly ever listened to anything with a more awakened interest than to the very extraordinary correspondence which had been read in his ears. He would by all means have it spread before the world. It was the very thing he wanted to see. He wanted to see whether, as soon as any laxity or remissness was manifested by a custodian of the public money, he was frowned upon by the Government, or whether its organs bowed to a defaulter, and treated him with criminal lenity because he was a powerful demagogue? Were they ready to sacrifice the principles of the Constitution to the interests of party? The gentleman from Mississippi had amused them all by the manner in which he has exposed some of these transactions; it was impossible to listen to some things he had said, and resist the force of his humor; but still it was a most grave and serious matter; and Mr. L. had left the House deeply and painfully musing at the disclosures of official malfeasance which had been brought to light. And what was his astonishment to hear, at this particular moment, of all others, the principles of economy resorted to as a reason against printing these matters, and sending them abroad into every part of the country! Never was there an expenditure which would better pay for itself in the good it would effect. This was a document, which above all others, ought to be sent abroad on all the winds, especially at this moment, when a new system was proposed by the Executive for the custody of the public treasure, and the people were called to compare the two schemes between which they were, by their Representatives, to choose. He hoped the printing would be ordered.

Mr. WISE said he was desirous of saying a few words in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS.] That gentleman assumed that my object in wishing for the printing of the Secretary's correspondence (the most important documents among those proposed to be printed) was merely to show that defalcations existed to a large amount.

Mr. THOMAS interposed to explain. He had not intended to take any such position; he then went into a recapitulation of the points he had made in his speech.

Mr. WISE. I understand the gentleman; I understand him most perfectly. I should not understand him any better after he had made five thousand explanations of his speech than I did before he made it. I knew that that gentleman's party instincts would lead him to oppose the publication of these documents. I say this without intending to impugn that gentleman's motives or his integrity. I speak only of his party instincts. Modify the motion as I may, I well know he will never vote for it. If the gentleman had patiently sat here with me the other day for six hours and a half, until I had pretty fully eviscerated this document No. 297, containing the correspondence of Mr. Woodbury with his land office receivers, he would have found out that my object had not been to show; as he says, what everybody knew before, viz: that great and numerous defalcations do exist, but to declare in the face of day that, if I had the least hope of either being sustained by this House, or of getting an honest trial in the other branch, I would not wait twenty-four hours till I filed articles of impeachment, and rely on no other proof than is contained in this document. And I will agree to forfeit forever my public station, to turn my back upon these halls, and never again dare to offer myself to the confidence of my constituents, if on this document No. 297, and on this alone, I cannot convict the Secretary of the Treasury of willful and corrupt neglect and violation of his official duty. And I ask, was there ever such an offer publicly made, such a challenge openly proposed, in Parliament or Congress, in respect to a Cabinet Minister, without his friends accepting it, and calling for charges? I say again, give me twelve honest men of the Secretary's own party, and let them be put upon their oaths to render a true verdict according to evidence, and I pledge myself to convict him on an indictment at common law. I will show not merely that defalcations have taken place, but that the Secretary is himself the chief offender. I do not mince my terms; I speak coolly, deliberately. I once more repeat the averment, that the Secretary of the Treasury is guilty of willful, gross, and corrupt neglect and violation of his public duty; and I say that this document No. 297 will prove the fact under his own hand. It is to furnish these proofs that I have called for the printing of these documents. I do not cry, like the starling, without knowledge what my cry means. I have been treated by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] just as my friend near me [Mr. PRENTISS] was treated by him to-day. He has accused me of a vague, unmeaning charge of corruption; but I will stand before any honest tribunal, and I will ask that the Secretary may there be heard in his own defense. I cannot with safety do this here; it would not be safe; I should get a verdict according to party, not according to evidence. I am, therefore, driven to another tribunal—the tribunal of the American people. I ask only that the Secretary may be heard at their bar; and yet gentlemen are disposed to deny me this fair, open, honest opportunity of trying a public delinquent. I do not ask you to give my charges to the people; that I will do at my own expense; I barely ask that Mr. Woodbury himself may be heard.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] says that he must have the strongest proof before he can believe the charge which I have preferred. I do not ask him or any man to believe it without the strongest reasons. I have preferred the charge openly—in the face of the Department. I am ready to take the responsibility of making it before the gentleman's own Senate. He says he must have strong proof; no doubt, and I will give him proofs as strong as Holy Writ: but though one should rise from the dead, there are some men who will not believe. I ask the gentleman from Maryland, seriously, respectfully, candidly, how it is possible he could rise here in his place, and talk about requiring strong proof, when there is proof before his eyes? He holds the document this moment in his hand. I ask him if he has read it? Has he carefully and patiently eviscerated its contents? I pause for his reply.

Mr. THOMAS said that he did not suppose so voluminous a document had been read throughout by any member of the House. He had looked into the document, and read parts of it, but he had not read the whole.

Mr. WISE. I have read the whole—every word and letter and figure, from page one to four hundred. I have read the whole of these two hundred and sixty letters to his receivers; and I doubt whether one in fifty of the gentleman's own party would not, if examined now, be found totally ignorant of the facts which these letters disclose. Yes, sir; gentlemen rise and reproach the Opposition with making charges like the starling, and they themselves are utterly ignorant of the true facts of their own case—the true condition of things in the country around them; ignorant of admitted facts—facts admitted by their own official associates! The gentleman objects to printing the document. Why? Has he read it? Has it been sent to the people? Has one in a hundred of them ever looked into it? To hear the gentleman talk, one would think they had gone through the document—masticated it, and digested all it contains; and yet they are as ignorant of it as their constituents, who never saw the outside of the book, or ever heard of what is inside. Still they cry “useless! useless! extravagant!”

The gentleman from Maryland says that there have always been defalcations; that they ran through all Administrations, from the foundation of the Government. But that has nothing to do with the question. I propose to print only what have happened between the years 1834 and 1838. Has that gentleman, I wonder, forgotten that this Administration came into power in 1829? I rather think not. Well, sir, I give him up all the interval, from 1829 to 1834; yes, sir, five years' grace.

Though this Administration was conceived and born in sin, and has grown up in manifold iniquities, I will give him a space like that required for the growth of the morus multicaulis; I will not touch his plant till its stem is firm and its fibers well compacted, and its leaves full and flourishing. And after that—since 1834—I will show him sixty cases of defalcation, fully known to this Secretary of the Treasury, where the defaulters were warned, watched, reproached, threatened, forgiven, and their defaults, while still existing and continued, in some cases actually sanctioned by a RENOMINATION TO OFFICE.

Sir, the gentleman actually objects to printing a report of the Secretary of the Treasury! What, sir, has it come to this? Have you a Secretary whose reports cannot be relied on—whose reports you dare not print lest you spread before the people a libel?

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly said no such thing.

Mr. WISE. Why, sir, the gentleman made such objections to printing one of these reports as actually induced me to strike it out of my resolution. I did so on his own argument, that the document contained false information.

Mr. THOMAS. I said “erroneous.”

Mr. WISE. Well, you may be as gentle in your terms as the Secretary himself to his defaulting subalterns; it does not alter the matter. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMERELONG] did say, that to print the documents would be to publish a multitude of libels on good and honest citizens. The reports of your Secretary, then, are to be suppressed for false and libelous matter. Did I ever make a worse charge against your Secretary? Was ever a grosser charge made against a man at the head of the most important Department of the Government than that his friends are under the necessity of suppressing his public official reports? Verily it is time we had a change of men. What! a Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it is to send to this House nothing but true and authentic information touching things under his supervision and cognizance, to send here a document which his own friends dare not send abroad, because it is false and libelous! Sir, I believe what the gentlemen say of that document. Though the document No. 111 shows gross neglect and great incorrectness in the records of his Department, yet I do believe it does exhibit many men as public defaulters who are not defaulters; nay, the very reverse. I have therefore stricken document No. 111 out of my resolution.

But, sir, no such objection applies to document No. 297, which contains this precious correspondence. Gentlemen cannot, will not, dare not say that Mr. Woodbury has libeled himself. They dare not deny his signature. He did not forge his own name, I suppose. No, sir; no plea can be put in here of non est factum.

The gentleman from Maryland says that no party in particular is to blame for these defalcations, because defalcations have happened under all parties. Will the gentleman be so good as to tell us what party was to blame in the case of the receiver, Linn? That man was guilty of malversation; the Secretary knew it, and threatened him, and then renominated him for a new appointment. He was confirmed; and, again proving in default, was warned again and again and again, and, after all, continued in office till he finally fell into the slough of defalcation. Was no party to blame for this? Or is it the villainous Whigs who are to blame for thus rewarding a public depredator? The gentleman, however, says that some defaulters have been Whigs, and some Locofocos; they have been men of all parties. I answer, not under this Administration. I ask the gentleman to point out one. It has been said that Swartwout was a Conservative. Be that as it may, he was one of the very greatest of all General Jackson's favorites; he was his open, active, clamorous advocate, and did more to effect his election to the Presidency than any other man in the State of New York, if not in the United States; and he was rewarded for it to his heart's content. Sir, the gentleman cannot show us a solitary Whig among all the defaulting receivers at the western land offices. I will show the gentleman, if he will print this document, where one of the defaulters gives it openly to the Secretary, as his excuse for not paying over a large amount of public money in his hands, that his Democratic friends advised him not to leave the ground till after the presidential election which brought Mr. Van Buren into power. But admitting that they were Whigs, every one of them, does that justify or excuse a Secretary of the Treasury in continuing men in office who, as he well knew, were diverting the public money to their own use—shaving with it—speculating on it—and in renominating them to office while still defaulters? In permitting one of his perambulating agents to advise him to retain a thief in office, because his hands were now full, and he would steal no more, whereas a new hand would only follow his example? And is it to be an excuse for the thefts of one party, to say, “well, you stole too?” I do not know one Whig in all this document of defalcations; if there were a hundred, is this an argument to be used here? Is this the salt that is to cure the corruptions of Administration men? The charge is, that the party picked out these men, appointed them to office, and held them in office, while they were picking and stealing, until their “hands were full.” And what is the answer? “You pick and steal too.” How many Whigs they may have bought up by the hopes of such golden opportunities, I cannot say; perhaps many. But I put it to the honor and the integrity of the proud and honorable gentleman from Maryland, a man who would disdain to become a defaulter himself, to say whether this is a fit argument for him to put forth in defense of such an officer as Mr. Woodbury? Sir, it is the strongest of all demonstrations of the state of morals to which the party is reduced. For myself, I despise a Whig thief as heartily as any other.

Mr. THOMAS. I am sure the honorable gentleman from Virginia does not intend willfully to misrepresent me; but he has now certainly put me in a false position. I said that men of all political parties, and under every successive Administration, had been found public defaulters; some of them under the Administration of the venerable gentleman behind me, [Mr. ADAMS.]

Mr. WISE. I understand the gentleman's position perfectly: it is, that defaulters have not belonged to one party alone. Well, sir, and what does that argument amount to? Analyze it, and it comes to precisely what I say. The charge on his party and his Secretary is, that they knew of these enormous defalcations, and connived at them; and the answer to that is, “there always have been defaulters of all parties.” Can a gentleman of integrity rely on such a defense? The true answer would be, “your party and your Secretaries knew as well as we, and they connived at defalcations just as we have done.” That would be an answer. But can it be said: is it true? will the gentleman say it? I do not, in my call, go back an inch beyond 1834, and I show the defalcations were not only multiplied and enormous, but that they were tolerated and connived at. Now let the gentleman show us any other Secretary of the Treasury, from Washington's days, who did the like. Let him produce us a Secretary who ever before reported to Congress that he knew of cases, by fifties and by hundreds, where his subordinates were faithless and corrupt, and yet that he retained them in office, and renominated them when their term expired, and that they still went on to plunder, and were still retained, till the money was finally lost. Let him show us that. Show me one such case, and then he may talk of precedents for an offense which no precedents can justify.

I do show him such proof against his officer; and now when I ask that this proof, so plain, so conclusive, so undeniable, that the plainest farmer in the country can understand it who can read English, the gentleman very gravely talks about twenty thousand copies being too many: oh, it will cost so much! Sir, would he stand ten thousand any better? or five thousand? Does he forget how many readers there are? how many readers who vote? Why, sir, in New York there were polled, at the last election, three hundred and seventy thousand votes, and in Pennsylvania two hundred and fifty thousand. Sir, in these two States alone there are three hundred thousand blind men—men who as blindly and implicitly believe in this Administration as the gentleman from Maryland does, but the scales from whose eyes would fall before the bright and piercing light of facts like these, as before the touch of the Saviour. The book will be read by the gentleman's own constituents: has he any objection? I wish to send this information into his own district; dare he not let it in? or does he desire them to remain so blind as not to see the light of the noonday sun? How many copies will these twenty thousand give to each State? Just seven hundred and sixty-nine. Seven hundred and sixty-nine copies to a whole State! This illumination, I should imagine, was partial enough to suit his views. Sir, I would, if I had my will, gather the light of those documents into a focus so bright and so hot that every Dutchman in Maryland and Pennsylvania might light his pipe with it. [A laugh.] But the gentleman cannot bear even twilight; the glimmerings of a dark lantern are too much for him. Twenty thousand copies are too many! He cannot bear even light that is strong! For myself, I would multiply it like the primers and the catechisms and the religious tracts are multiplied by the societies, and I would put a copy into the hands of every babe in politics, from Maine to Georgia. Yes, sir, from Maine. Give the truth fair play, and it will work like heaven, till it leavens the whole lump.

But, sir, the gentleman branched off from the printing of these documents into a discussion of the sub-Treasury system. [Mr. W. here illustrated this digression by some remarks which seemed to amuse those members seated near him, but which the reporter was not able to catch.] The gentleman tells us that when we can dispense with all officers to collect our revenue, then defalcations will be a good argument against that scheme. Sir, we are not driven to any such absurdity. We apply these facts of defalcation to the true and legitimate use; we say, that since we must have men to collect the revenue, it is highly important that they be honest men; and that to make them sub-Treasurers, and then indulge them in default after default, and still keep them in office, is not a likely way to make them honest. And further, we say, that if such are the fruits even under the pet bank system, they will be still worse under a sub-Treasury. And we point to these as the natural consequences of such a system, and as the strongest argument against its being perpetuated. Can the gentleman see no connection? And yet further, we say, that, adopt what system you please, unless you place honest men than honest Levi at the head of your Treasury, the system must totter and fall. There is the application we make of these facts, and there is the argument for printing not only twenty thousand copies of this document, but a far greater number. Sir, the people will understand the argument, though the gentleman from Maryland cannot. We do not want this publication merely to show the country that one sheep has gone astray. No, sir, it is not in politics as in religion; there we are told the good shepherd leaves the ninety and nine sheep who have not gone astray, and goes after the poor stray sheep; but here it is just the reverse. I want to stick by the ninety and nine, holding the straying of one as an indication that if we do not look out, the rest will follow. I would hold them together till I have removed the scab from the whole of them. Yes, sir, I would wash them thoroughly—not white-wash them, Mr. Speaker, [laughter]—and yet I have my fears that washing would kill some of them, [loud laughter.] Sir, it would be as much dreaded by them as by a dog with the hydrophobia. [Laughter.] Sir, I would spread the alarm, and spread it in time. When I see a dog running swiftly along, with his head covered with foam, and his eyes looking green and glassy, I am for crying "mad dog!" that everybody may be on their guard. If we have lepers in the community, I will cry out, as others approach, "unclean! unclean!" I have been raising that cry for years; you would not believe me; but now you all see the truth, for the leprosy has broken out into a running sore. I admit that each defaulter is answerable for his own offense, but I hold Mr. Woodbury answerable for them all; he knew of their crimes, and kept them still in office. Give me this document, that I may show that to the nation.

But, lest this debate continue forever, I will now attempt to bring it to a close by moving the—

Mr. STANLY asked Mr. WISE not to move the previous question, but allow him to say a few words in reply to the gentleman behind him, [Mr. ATHERTON.]

Mr. WISE consented, on condition that Mr. STANLY would himself make the motion.

Mr. STANLY said he would vote for printing these documents, for the reason that they will give light to the people of his district. It is light only that the people of our country want; that they may be induced to assist those who are now struggling to wrest power from the hands of the "spoilsmen." I took these documents home with me, after the adjournment in July last, and read extracts from them to my constituents, and they listened to them with surprise. Even those who had heretofore supported this Administration, and that which immediately preceded it, resolved hereafter not to believe men who could so shamefully abuse their confidence. They had heard charges of this sort before from Whig newspapers, but were told they were false. But now the evidence came from the Secretary of the Treasury himself; they could doubt no longer. There are six counties in my district, Mr. Speaker, and there is but one copy of Document No. 297 in the district. I appeal to the generosity of the gentleman from Maryland, and ask him not to refuse to so large a portion of the people of this country the information which this document will give them. There are some in my district who still think General Jackson was sincere and correct when he told the country that he "turned none but knaves out of office, and put none but honest men in." I want these men to see how these "honest" receivers have taken care of the people's money, and how much mistaken the old General was.

Mr. Speaker, there was much said by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] which called for reply, but which has been answered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] who has just taken his seat. That gentleman [Mr. THOMAS] has said, sir, that there were defaulters "of all political parties." It may be that there are Whig defaulters; but how they came into office under this Administration is matter of astonishment to me; for I have been repeatedly solicited, since I have been a member of this House, to sign recommendations for applicants for office, (and recommendations, too, written by some who hold seats in a body said to be higher and more dignified than this,) and the reason assigned, above all others, in favor of the applicant, has been that he is "a genuine Democrat." "Defaulting Whigs," therefore, must have obtained office before this form of recommendation became fashionable, and are probably defaulters in some office worth about ten dollars a year—the emoluments being so small none of the "genuine" wanted it.

The gentleman from Maryland says speeches will answer as well as this document. Now, Mr. Speaker, if any Whig member of Congress should make a speech, embodying the facts set forth in these documents, and one of these speeches, perchance, should find its way into that gentleman's district, what would the Administration papers say of it? Would not the Globe, and the thousand bought-up presses of the country, say, in their usual language, that it was all a "Whig lie?" Why, sir, no Locofoco would read it. But a public document comes to them in a different form—from the Administration party, from an executive officer—the people cannot but hear it; and "out of their own mouths" will they be condemned.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] said, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, that there was no need of buying a starling to teach him to cry "corruption! corruption!" in the ears of the people of this country; and the gentleman from New Hampshire seemed to intimate that those who thus cry out "corruption!" were but starlings, taught to use words without meaning.

Mr. Speaker, this may be so; but, sir, there are various kinds of political starlings. Those who thus cry out "corruption, corruption, corruption," are starlings for the great body of the American people; these corruption-crying starlings were taught by respectable constituents to sing this note. They are starlings, sir, for a noble lion. But, sir, there is another class whose office is not quite so respectable. These are starlings of a party whose constant occupation has been to sing that they were the true Republicans, and all opposed to them "Aristocrats." Yes, sir, there are starlings of a caucus, too; of a midnight caucus, whose office it is to introduce resolutions upon slavery, which may be interpreted one way at the South, and another way at the North; which condemn abolition when it comes with one "view," but justify it when it has not "the views aforesaid;" resolutions which

"palter with us in a double sense;
That keep the word of promise to the ear,
And break it to the hope."

Resolutions which come in the spirit of Joab, when he said to Amasa, "Art thou in health, my brother?" and stabbed him under the fifth rib; resolutions which agree to lay petitions for the abolition of slavery on the table, but which yield the question of reception. I see you are uneasy, Mr. Speaker. You may save yourself the trouble of calling me to order. I have said all I intend to say upon abolition.

But, sir, the starlings. There are, sir, other starlings than those I have mentioned. I do not intend to be offensive in my language to any gentleman; but only to repel the charge that those who cry out "corruption" against this Administration are merely repeating words without meaning, and making charges without sufficient evidence. Our Secretary of the Treasury may have his starlings, too; and if he has, sir, I can only say with Pope, "What must be the priest, when the monkey is a god?"

As a quotation has been made from something that has been formerly said in the British Parliament, I suppose it is lawful to quote what has been said on this floor as an offset. At the last session, Mr. Speaker, an eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] said something about starlings. You remember it, no doubt, Mr. Speaker, for few here have heard that gentleman without wishing to remember what he said. I intend only to apply his remarks to that race of politicians who are crying out "Abolitionist" against all who differ from them politically. He told us, sir, that the starling was a "gentle and interesting bird." Rather are we reminded of a filthy parrot, hung out in front of a sailor boarding house, taught by its master to utter exclamations at each passer-by, and never joyous or happy unless when engaged in screaming out rogue or strumpet." So I am reminded of this parrot whenever I hear this cry of "Abolitionist! Abolitionist! Aristocrat! Aristocrat!" against all who think for themselves, and dare to differ with this Administration.

We are told, sir, that there has been no corruption in this Administration. I am at a loss to conceive what gentlemen call corruption. I ask those who say there has been no corruption, if they heard the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] the other day? The gentleman's presence restrains me from speaking of that speech in the language of commendation which it merits. I ask the Representatives from New Hampshire if any of them heard that speech, when the House was considering the motion of the gentleman from New York, to appoint a committee to examine Mr. Swartwout's defalcation? (By the way, Mr. Speaker, I suspect we have heard the last of that for this session. I do not believe the party intend to have any examination of that matter.) I ask those who say there was no corruption, if they heard the remarks of either the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE], or the painful speech of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS.]

Few of the party would listen to speeches of this character, sir, I know—speeches not merely abounding in biting sarcasm and galling invective, but well supported by facts, undenied, undeniable facts, from public documents. There were a few who listened to the speech of the gentleman from Virginia; for, after candlelight, I thought I saw some behind your chair, sir, in the dark, gnashing their teeth.

I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON], who won for himself last session the name of "Advocate General" of the Secretary of the Treasury, what he has to say to all these charges? Once, I remember, a gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS], who is now considered as an ally of the Administration, said on this floor, the Secretary of the Treasury ought to have a schoolmaster to teach him grammar and arithmetic, and his countryman [Mr. ATHERTON] raised himself in my estimation by his gallant and patriotic defense. Now, when a well-supported charge is brought, the simple answer is, "there is no corruption."

I want to call the attention of the House to another fact. When the gentleman from Virginia had finished, a Representative from New Hampshire rose in haste, and, I thought, to make some defense for the Secretary of the Treasury, when, lo and behold! he actually asked leave to offer a resolution that the Speaker appoint a Committee on Enrolled Bills! I hope yet to hear that gentleman [Mr. CUSHMAN] defend the Secretary with his accustomed ability. I hope, for the sake of the country, to hear some explanation of Harris's case, of Linn's case, and of Boyd's case. I hope to hear some excuse to justify the Secretary in allowing Swartwout to be a defaulter for six or seven years, and keeping it concealed, or some excuse for not discovering the defalcation. But, sir, when I return home, I will take this document in my hand, and will tell the honest men whom I represent that the defenders of this Administration say that there was no corruption in this Secretary's allowing, knowingly, partisan office-holders thus to use the public funds.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, said it had been insinuated, if not directly charged, by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON,] that documents which had been ordered to be printed at this session were not comestable. In reply, he made an explanation, showing that the delay in furnishing the extra copies of the documents accompanying the President's message was occasioned by the want of one of the maps which was to accompany these documents, and which was not yet completed by the engraver.

Mr. THOMPSON said that one of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland sounded somewhat strangely in his ear. It was this: that the present Administration was not responsible, because the cases contained in the report occurred during the past Administration.

Mr. THOMAS said that any attempt to hold this Administration responsible for the defalcations stated in document No. 111 must be futile, since defalcations had happened under all Administrations.

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, sir, what is the position now taken by the gentleman? Why, that, because defalcations have taken place under all Administrations, and in the nature of things will take place, therefore the Administration is not to be held responsible for continuing in office and reappointing known defaulters; men who, without excuse or palliation, had embezzled the public money. Defalcations may have taken place under all Administrations; but were the delinquents reappointed to office after a knowledge of their frauds? That is the gravamen of the charge. It is in this that we say that peculation was not only tolerated but encouraged. In one of the cases the embezzlement was not denied, but was admitted, and a bond given for the amount, and the officer reappointed. It shows, sir, as was said by the gentleman from Mississippi, that their morality is the Spartan, by which the offense does not consist in doing the act, but in doing it so bunglingly as to be discovered; that virtue which Shakspeare ascribes to the Venetian ladies—not to leave undone, but to keep unknown. It is saying, in no unequivocal language, embezzle, use, and speculate on the public money as much as you choose, provided you keep it concealed. But it is said that these things took place under the late Administration; that it is not the fox that has broken into the roost, but the lion. Ay, yes, sir, we are now beyond the reach of that lion's paw.

But, sir, all these robberies of the Treasury sink into utter insignificance in comparison with the stupendous proposal to legalize such a system, and make it perpetual. This, we are told, is to be a constitutional Treasury. Yes, sir, everything is baptized "constitutional" in these days. I think I saw the other day, in some paper published "down east," an advertisement of "constitutional pens," and with just as much reason. What is the gentleman's argument for this independent Treasury? Why, sir, it is that we cannot well avoid having agents to receive the public money, faithful as they now have been proven to be; and what would common sense draw as an inference from that? Why merely that, if we must have them, and as they are liable to temptation, we ought to trust them as little as possible. But what is the gentleman's inference? It is that, as they cannot be trusted with small sums, he is for trusting them with all the revenue. The gentleman seems to reverse the scriptural principle of recompense: "because thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will make thee lord over many things;" but his principle seems to be, "because thou hast been faithless in a few things, I will make thee ruler over many." We have had two classes of agents—banks and individuals. The first have been faithful beyond anticipation; the latter faithless to a general and alarming extent. We have lost by banks as depositories less than a million, from the foundation of the Government; whilst we have lost by one single sub-Treasurer a million and a quarter.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. We have lost forty millions by banks.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir; I know better. I know that such a statement has been in public documents, and one emanating from that gentleman; but it is a fraud to say so—a fraud in argument, I mean. I will give the gentleman the precise amount lost by the banks as depositories—$759,000. In the reports alluded to, this sum is swelled by charging upon the banks the loss from the use of their depreciated paper. Let us examine this shallow deception. It was during the war that this depreciated paper was used: what else could be done? There was not ten millions of specie in the country, and annual appropriations of fifty millions. Specie was clearly out of the question. Treasury notes were the only alternative; and they were tried; and the result was, that they were at a discount much below bank notes, and this, in the limited amounts issued, from the fact that bank notes were used; but if bank notes had been rejected, and Treasury notes issued, they would have fallen to the worthlessness of Continental money. As it was, they were greatly below paper money. Yes, sir, we have lost nearly twice as much by one sub-Treasurer as we have lost in all from banks from the foundation of the Government. What does this comparison show? It shows, as clear as the light, the superior safety of banks. No man here will dare rise in his place, and attempt to prove that indebtedness from corporations is not a more safe condition than indebtedness from individuals. We have tried both; we have found the one class dishonest; tempted even by small sums to defraud the public, and led on to speculate at last to the amount of millions. And what is the remedy? Why, sir, to make them the depositories of our entire revenue. That is the logic. Were these logicians acting in their own private affairs, I am apt to think they would draw sounder conclusions.

Take this case of Swartwout. In carrying the public funds from the custom-house to the bank, he embezzled more than a million: the panacea is, to give him millions on millions to keep permanently. Small sums are not safe whilst merely in transitu from the custom-house to the bank; but we are urged to trust millions to them permanently; and why? Because of the additional cobweb securities of this bill. It is, in my judgment, a most unsafe mode of keeping the public money, and fearfully demoralizing in its tendency. If adopted, as expunging is the order of the day, it would be well to expunge from the Lord's prayer that admirable passage, "Lead us not into temptation."

Mr. T. said he took no pleasure in thus early being forced into a discussion of this question. But the gentleman from Maryland had introduced it, and he could not permit his remarks to pass unanswered. Mr. T. was aware of the many considerations that demanded that he should measure his language upon this subject. The State which he in part represented held different opinions from himself, and he did not hesitate now to say, when improper motives can scarcely be attributed to him, and there is no community upon earth for whose enlightened patriotism he had so profound a respect. This is no new opinion; it had grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength; it was more than an opinion; it was a sentiment, a passion; and he would add, in all sincerity, that never was the State (he spoke of the State, not of individuals) actuated by a more sincere conviction, or a more interested patriotism, in any of those periods which have heretofore so gloriously marked her high career. If he had any doubts on the question, he would long since have surrendered his opinions to those of the State. But believing, and, indeed, knowing, as he did, he never could support, and never should cease to oppose, with all his poor powers, so disastrous a measure. He greatly doubted whether the people of this country ever would practically elect another President; whether we have not taken the step fatal to all other Republics, of the President nominating his successor. Adopt this system, and he saw little hope of resistance to any future Administration.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, made further explanations in relation to the delays in the delivery of certain documents ordered to be printed in consequence of a map not being completed.

He then went on to admit that the revenue must be collected by agents, and that these agents would always be more or less liable to corruption. He maintained, however, that the sub-Treasury scheme would be no remedy for the evil. Yet he thought a remedy was practicable; and if no other member did, he now gave notice that, when the sub-Treasury bill came up, he should move an amendment providing for the adoption of the plan now in use in Virginia in regard to the collection of the revenue. The collectors never touched a dollar of the money collected; the merchant deposited the amount of his duties in bank, and gave a bank certificate to the collector; the money was drawn out, not by the collector, but by the Treasurer of the United States. This plan would go far to obviate the difficulty, and render such cases as that of Swartwout impossible. Mr. J. was opposed to the whole plan of securities, and this mode of collection would render them unnecessary. It would concentrate responsibility, and fix the public eye on a single man. He complimented the eloquence of his colleague, [Mr. THOMAS,] agreed with him that corruption ever had and ever would exist under all Governments; but objected to the sub-Treasury scheme as going to radiate and disseminate that corruption in all directions through the country. If the receiver could be placed in some safe where he could be locked up, then Mr. J. would trust him with the personal custody of a million and a half of dollars, as in Swartwout's case; but not otherwise.

Mr. THOMAS rose to say a few words to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and make a brief reply to one part of the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.]

The gentleman from Virginia had taken an extraordinary advantage of an admission made in a private conversation. He had said to the gentleman from Virginia that he (Mr. T.) had not read the whole of document No. 297. Possessed of this fact, in this way, the gentleman from Virginia had put the question, in the course of his speech, "has the gentleman read the document proposed to be printed?" He knew what answer would be given, for he had previously been privately told that the whole of the document had not been perused. This circumstance the gentleman has commented on for effect, and charges me with ignorance of material facts. Such a proceeding cannot but be considered as very unfair. When the gentleman reflects, he will feel that he has done himself and me gross injustice. I can, without difficulty, lay a foundation for returning this language to the gentleman. Has he read the report of the Secretary of War, with its accompanying documents? Has he read a report from the same source, recommending a system of defense for the northern frontier, with its tabular statements, throughout? Has the gentleman read one fourth of the voluminous document I hold in my hand? We know he has not. Then he is ignorant of all these important papers, and has voted, notwithstanding his ignorance, for or against this publication. In so doing, he has acted as ninety-nine hundredths of the House have done. It is not to be presumed that any one of us reads all the documents published to enable us to vote for or against their publication. Before we act finally upon the subjects to which they relate, we read all or such parts of them as are required, to be prepared to vote understandingly. This is what I have done, and shall do in the present case. And I repeat, the gentleman has acted very unfairly in attempting to produce an impression anywhere that the statement made by me to him in the first instance, in a private conversation, was worthy of being brought out in the debate to be commented on.

But, as the gentleman seems to challenge a comparison of the degree of information which we respectively possess, I will run the parallel a little further. I have shown that he is as ignorant as I am (borrowing his phraseology) of facts. I now propose to convict him of an ignorance of a more important character. Unless he has better reasons to assign for his declaration that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be impeached than any urged here to-day, he is ignorant of the principles of morals and law by which the conduct of that officer should be tried. The proof he has adduced is to be found in document No. 297. It furnishes in many, if not in all cases, partial testimony only. We learn from it that certain public officers stand charged in the books of the Treasury Department with large sums of money, placed in their hands for disbursement; and, also, that the Secretary and other officers of that Department have made repeated calls in vain upon these disbursing officers for a final settlement of their accounts. But this document does not give us the letters of those officers in reply. We know not what apologies they have offered for delay. They may have unadjusted claims against the United States to set off. They may need vouchers for expenditures yet to be procured. With this state of facts, the gentleman undertakes to charge the Secretary, not only with negligence, but with willful misconduct; with malfeasance of a grade justifying impeachment, because he has failed to dismiss all those officers. Surely this proceeding is in violation of all law and of sound morals. No man who has been in public employment could have escaped impeachment, if the gentleman has to-day made out a case justifying such a proceeding. In support of this, cases innumerable could be produced. I will content myself with one known to the whole country. For many years, the late James Monroe, whose personal integrity was never impeached, stood charged upon the books of the Treasury with about eighty thousand dollars. According to the record, he could have been arraigned as a defaulter.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Monroe never was a defaulter.

Mr. THOMAS replied, I know that, and am about to refer to facts in proof of it. But while his accounts were unsettled, and a balance of public money was in his hands unaccounted for, he could have been styled a defaulter with as much propriety as that epithet can be applied to many who are now arraigned. Mr. Monroe, in the course of time, settled his accounts, when he satisfied the accounting officer that the United States were in fact indebted to him. Was Mr. Monroe, on account of this transaction, excluded from office? Did he not, on the contrary, subsequently rise from grade to grade of public appointment, until he reached the presidential chair? And were the men who promoted him guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors? Let it not be supposed that I am justifying the proceeding of the Secretary of the Treasury, or passing judgment upon those men who are said to be public defaulters. I am doing no such thing. I have undertaken simply to show that the gentleman from Virginia is ignorant of the principles upon which an impeachment should be based, unless he has other evidences of guilt besides those exhibited to-day. But is it not time to be done with declamation and invective (for which the gentleman has much talent) upon this subject?

If the Secretary be guilty, let the gentleman bring forward a specific, tangible charge. Let him submit a resolution declaring that therein, and then the Secretary of the Treasury did an act calling for his impeachment, and therefore I arraign him before the bar of this House and before the bar of public opinion. Let this be done, and I pledge myself solemnly to do justice in the matter. I know that I have party attachments. They are strong. I cannot but feel a partiality for men with whom I have fought many a hard battle in what we esteemed a good cause. But I know that I can divest myself of all prejudice, and give an impartial vote, when the issue is made up in due form between the Secretary and his accusers.

Before I close my remarks I desire to say a very few words in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] He much mistakes in supposing that I intended to palliate the defalcations of the friends of the Administration by showing that their opponents were no better.

In repelling the assertion that the friends of this Administration dreaded the publication of a list of the names of these defaulters, I referred to the known fact that there are on the list men of both political parties now existing, and of all parties which have ever existed in this country. These men were not put in office by General Jackson and his successor alone. Some of them have been appointed by each of the other Presidents of the United States. This circumstance was adduced to show that no particular party has cause to dread the publication and republication of these documents. Let them be published; and let us, instead of criminating and recriminating for mere party purposes, profit by the past, and, looking to the great and vital interests involved, guard, if we can, against a recurrence of similar evils hereafter. But let not the friends of economy now, or any time hereafter, be driven or dragged into a lavish and extravagant expenditure of money by printing an unreasonable number of copies of any document whatever. Gentlemen tell us there are three hundred and seventy thousand voters in New York, and nearly an equal number in Pennsylvania. Well, what then? Are we to publish one copy of these documents for every voter in the United States? No man has proposed a measure of that monstrous character. Then, if that is not to be done, some medium between no publication at all and the printing of millions of copies of large documents must be adopted, and that medium seems to be to print a sufficient number to furnish with a copy each editor of a periodical or newspaper, each legislator, and each public library in the Union, and leave a few copies to each member of this House for general distribution. When that has been done, we should touch the public money no further. If a more general diffusion of information than is to be had here is desirable, each member can, out of his own private funds, get the means; and in expenditures of that character my constituents have not had, and will never have, cause to charge me with parsimony.

Mr. MERCER had heard with great regret the name of Mr. Monroe introduced in this debate as having been a defaulter to the Government. It might, perhaps, have arisen from the circumstance that he had mentioned, at his seat, that, as far back as the administration of Mr. Madison, it had been the practice to publish the names of defaulters, and that Mr. Monroe's name had been so published. He might have added the name of Timothy Pickens also, which was published under a similar charge. The publication of Mr. Monroe happened in a singular manner. A box of public account books had been wheeled, on its way to another place, into the office of Benjamin Franklin Bache, of Philadelphia, editor of the Aurora, who had copied the debit side alone of Mr. Monroe's account with the Government, in which it appeared he was debtor to the amount of $80,000, and published it in that paper. Mr. Monroe was then sick in Albemarle county, Virginia; yet he arose from his bed and mounted his horse, drew out his account and immediately had it settled. This was a different matter from the final settlement of his account after leaving the Presidency. It was the custom of the Treasury to charge a public officer with all the sums paid him on account of his salary, and not to credit him by his services; hence he stood on the books as a debtor, when he did not owe a farthing. This might occasion some of the statements in Document No. 111, which had created such amazement. Mr. M. said he had no idea that these cases had the slightest analogy to those of these land receivers; and he would undertake to say that a more scandalous correspondence he had never listened to in his life than that which had taken place between these men and the Secretary of the Treasury; and he was prepared to sustain an impeachment of that officer whenever it should be moved in the House.

Mr. BOON said the epithet of "corruption" had been so long and so often charged upon the late and present Administrations of the General Government, both in and out of this Hall, that it had now become an old song, stripped of all the influence upon the public mind; for which so many unfounded charges had been made, and ten thousand times reiterated, without ever one of them having been sustained by even the shadow of proof. Mr. B. said this system of charging upon the Administration corruption by wholesale had been persevered in for years past, in every possible manner, and what, he would ask, had been the response from the people in every quarter or section of this Confederacy? I (said Mr. B.) have been listening to hear some reference made by those who originated those charges to the recent general elections which have taken place in some twelve States of this Union since the adjournment of the last panic-making session of Congress, to show that those charges are believed, and that the Administration is condemned by the people. But, Mr. Speaker, I have not heard the first allusion made by the Opposition to the late popular elections which have taken place in those States, and where the measures of the Administration were made test questions in the election of Representatives to the next Congress? Sir, these vague charges of corruption, made against the Administration, have been passed upon by the people of twelve States since the last adjournment of Congress, and they have said, by their late election for Congressmen and other officers, that they do not believe one word of all that has been said and published against the Administration and its leading measures. A gentleman near me, from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] mentions the State of New York as not having given a favorable response at her late elections to the measures of the Administration. Be it so. Yet eleven other States, in which general elections have been held since the panic-making session of Congress, have given unequivocal demonstrations of their entire confidence in the wisdom and integrity of the Administration, and of their approval of its general policy, including the independent Treasury measure.

With a full knowledge of these unerring facts, the eloquent and talented member from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] declared in his place, but a few moments since, that he will continue to ring in the ears of the Administration party the cry of "corruption!" "corruption!" "corruption!" so long as he is a member of this House; and after his public services shall have closed here, he will still cry "corruption!" This cry of corruption has been loud and long proclaimed in this Hall of the people's Representatives, and he had supposed that no gentleman could be elected to a seat on that floor whose word would not be taken as truth by his constituents; yet it would seem that some gentlemen wished their word to be indorsed by the publication of a document from a Government officer!

Mr. B. said he would vote against the printing of an extra number of these documents, which had been once printed by order of the House, simply because the only possible good that could or would be obtained by the printing of an extra number of them would be a useless and extravagant expenditure of the public money, which could in no wise benefit any person save the Public Printer. To him it would be a fat job, and then it would be charged by the Opposition as another item of wasteful and extravagant appropriation of the public money on the part of the Administration. In reference to the oft-repeated charge of corruption on the part of the Administration, why, I ask, do not gentlemen thus vaguely charging, bring forward specific charges with a view to have those who may be found guilty punished and removed from office by impeachment or otherwise? Until this shall be done, the cry of corruption here or elsewhere will fall dead upon the public ear. As to the "picking and stealing" from the public Treasury, charged by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] Mr. B. said he somewhat suspected, from recent developments, that before all was over, it would become matter of dispute whether the Whigs or Conservatives had "picked" or stolen most from the public Treasury. They seem to be the great whales in this business of "picking and stealing" from the Treasury, as has been charged by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] That there has been public defaulters under the present and former Administrations, was not to be denied; and the like may be expected so long as there shall be public money collected and disbursed, whether through the agency of banks, or other Government agents. But if we are to judge of the future by recent passed indications of public sentiment in reference to the numerous vague charges of "corruption" in the Administration, made on this floor during the last two or three years, there is reason to believe that the whole affair will pass off as it did with the shepherd boy, of whom we have read in Dillworth's fables, who is represented to have been in the habit of crying wolf, wolf, wolf, when there was no wolf, until every one who heard the cry of wolf, settled down in the belief that there was no wolf.

Mr. BOND obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment; whereupon
The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 29, 1838.

Mr. BOND asked the House to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business at the adjournment on yesterday, (the resolution to print certain documents.)

Objection being made, Mr. B. moved a suspension of the rules, on which motion,

Mr. HARLAN demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 79, nays 65.

So the rules were not suspended, not being two thirds.

Mr. CHAMBERS made an earnest appeal to the House to proceed with the Private Calendar, first disposing of the Senate bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, hoped his colleague would except the bill to postpone the payment of the fourth installment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested that when that bill came up it could be postponed to a day certain.

Mr. CHAMBERS's resolution was agreed to without a dissenting voice; and the bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

The bill to postpone the payment of the fourth installment was, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, postponed to and made the special order of the day for Tuesday week.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th July, in respect to the donations of the public lands and the quantity surveyed, the plans for dividing it in its proceeds, the improvements most eligible in its present system of sale, with other matters of a character somewhat similar.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved that these documents be laid on the table, and five thousand extra copies printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON remarked that this was a very important subject, and he hoped the gentleman would move that this report and his own resolution, together with, if he thought proper, the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAYNES], be referred to a committee composed of one member from each State.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, after a few eulogistic remarks upon the character of the report and the importance of the statistical details appended thereto, made the motion suggested by Mr. ROBERTSON.

Mr. CASEY remarked that he believed this report related to the disposition of the public lands generally, and as such subjects had always heretofore been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, he now made the motion for that reference. To the printing he had no objection.

Mr. MENEFE opposed this motion on the ground that it was a subject that belonged to the States exclusively in their separate interests.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, said that he was opposed to sending the report and accompanying documents to the Committee on Public Lands. The subject-matter did not legitimately belong to that committee. It was a subject of no ordinary legislation. It involved millions and hundreds of millions in its consequences. Every State in the Union had a deep interest in it. The States were tenants in common in the public domain, and a question of such vast, such deep and general interest, ought to be referred to a special committee, in which the interest of each individual State should be represented. Vermont has a deep interest, with her sister States, in the public domain. If any legislation is had touching this great question, the members of the House ought on their return home to be able, not only to inform their constituents of the principles upon which the decision of the House rested, but the facts that governed them in making this decision.

This is not like the question just decided by the House, on motion to reconsider the vote of the House sending a bill from the Senate, and accompanying documents, to the Committee on Public Lands, for the purpose of committing to the Committee of Claims, the subject-matter of which confessedly belonged to the Committee on Public Lands, and so recognized by this House in sending it repeatedly, from session to session, to that committee. The subject-matter of this report no more belongs to the Committee on Public Lands than to any other standing committee of this House.

He did not well understand why the honorable gentleman from Illinois should be so very solicitous that it should go to the committee of which he is chairman. He did not impeach the justice and integrity of that committee; but, sir, such are the infirmities of human nature that we cannot, at all times and on all occasions, divest ourselves of local feelings and local interest. The Committee on Public Lands consists of nine members, three of whom belong to the thirteen confederated States, and but one to the northern and eastern States. Is this a just and fair representation, where so great and extensive interests are the subject of consideration and disposal? The State of Illinois will be fully represented in a committee of one from each State. This was the justice and equity of the case, and he hoped the motion of the gentleman from Maryland would be sustained by the House.

Mr. HAYNES said it required no argument to prove the importance of this subject. The House had been sufficiently instructed by its experience for the last few years. The importance of the question of distributing the public lands being conceded, it was obvious that a committee should be instituted as broadly as the interests concerned in it. It was a subject which interested every State in the Union, and notwithstanding the inconvenience arising from so large a committee as that proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and apart from the alleged hostile organization of the Committee on Public Lands, he was decidedly in favor of the proposition of his friend from Maryland. He entertained views somewhat peculiar as to the most proper mode of distribution, if Congress should determine to distribute the public lands, but would take a more suitable occasion to lay his views before the House and the country. He hoped the motion of the gentleman from Maryland would prevail, and that the subject would be sent to a select committee, which would not be embarrassed by a multiplicity of business, as was known to be the case with the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ROBERTSON advocated the reference to a general committee.

Mr. EWING complained of the injustice that would be inflicted on the new States by a consideration of this subject, when they had scarcely a moiety of their proper representation on this floor; and he moved to lay the whole subject on the table: but the yeas and nays having been ordered, he withdrew the motion.

Mr. TILLINGHAST briefly sustained Mr. JOHNSON's motion; after which,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, demanded the previous question, which prevailed.

The main question was on Mr. CASEY's motion to refer the report and documents to the Committee on the public Lands, and thereon

Mr. CHILDS demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 51, nays 130; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Cheatham, Crabb, Cushing, Duncan, Dunn, Ewing, Fry, Gallup, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Hamer, Harrison, Herod, Howard, Henry Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, Martin, May, Miller, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Murray, Petrik, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Randen, Kidway, Shields, Shepherd, Snyder, Spencer, Stone, Swearingen, Turney, Webster, Christopher H. Williams, and Yell—51.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allan, Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Chambers, Childs, Clark, Clowney, Coles, Corwin, Craig, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Davies, Deberry, Edwards, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Farrington, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, James Garland, Giddings, James Graham, Grandland, Grant, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Halley, Halsted, Hammond, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Haynes, Henry, Hoffman, Holt, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, William C. Johnson, Keim, Kennedy, Legare, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Mitchell, Montgomery, Noyes, Owens, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Potts, Pratt, Putnam, Randolph, Reed, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanley, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Towns, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, John White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, and Word—130.

So the motion to refer to the Committee on the Public Lands was decided in the negative; and it was referred to a committee to be composed of one member from each State, and five thousand extra copies ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the First Comptroller of the Treasury, in compliance with the provision of the acts of Congress, containing a statement of such officers as have not rendered their accounts within the year, or have balances unaccounted for, advanced one year prior to the 30th September, 1838.

2. Statement of the accounts in his office which have remained unsettled, or on which balances, appear to have been due more than three years prior to 30th September, 1838.

3. An abstract of moneys advanced prior to the 3d of March, 1809, on the books of the late accountant of the War Department, and which remained to be accounted for on the books of the Third Auditor.

Mr. WISE moved to print five thousand extra copies; which was agreed to.

Mr. POPE, on leave, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky on the subject of a western army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THOMAS asked leave to lay the following amendment to the rules on the table, giving notice of his intention to call it up on Monday:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended by adding to the twentieth rule the words "and on the first and third Friday of each month the calendar of private bills shall be called over, and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall be made, shall be first considered and disposed of—private bills from the Senate having a preference over private bills of the House."

Objection being made, Mr. T. moved to suspend the rules; but the House refused.

The Private Calendar was then proceeded in.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Colonel George Gibson was the first in order, being on its third reading.

It was opposed by Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont, who moved to strike out the enacting clause, (equivalent, that motion prevailing, to a rejection of the bill,) and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MCCLURE moved to postpone it till this day three weeks; whereupon

Mr. UNDERWOOD withdrew his motion, and Mr. MCCLURE's was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas P. Harrison had been rejected on the 15th of June last, and on the following day a motion was made to reconsider that vote, and it was now postponed to the same day as the above.

The bill for the relief of Josiah Strong and Samuel Remick was discussed at some length, and postponed to the same time.

The bill for the relief of James Bailey was postponed to the same day.

The bill for the relief of Pamela Brown was discussed for some time under the same motion; when

On motion of Mr. SOUTHGATE, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 31, 1838.

The PRESIDENT announced a communication from the War Department, transmitting a report from the Chief Engineer, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 27th instant, or the subject of the improvement of the harbor of St. Louis; which, on motion of Mr. LINN, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial from the Brady Guards, a gallant volunteer corps of the city of Detroit, composed of intelligent and patriotic young men, stating their services during the last winter in maintaining the supremacy of the laws and the neutrality of the country, and praying for the passage of an act granting them pay for three months' service on the occasion.

The memorial, with the documents which accompany it, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. N. also presented a petition from William Tuff, of Michigan, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. N. also presented two memorials from citizens of Michigan, praying for appropriations to improve the harbor of Brest, and the erection of a light-house at Stony Point, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KING presented a memorial of citizens of the Territory of Florida, interested in the construction of a railroad from Pensacola to Montgomery, Alabama, stating that they have imported railroad iron, which has been admitted free of duty on condition that it should be laid within three years, and not being able to place it on the road in the limited period, they ask an extension of time; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the memorial of John Prince, asking indemnity for the loss of a vessel destroyed by an officer of the Government during the last war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of a large number of the citizens of Missouri, praying for the erection of a custom-house at St. Louis, which shall also accommodate all the public officers at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Charles S. Hempstead, one of the sureties of Thomas Hempstead, praying for relief; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill allowing equitable commissions to agents for persons in whose favor awards have been made under treaties with foreign Powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due to the United States, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill supplementary to the act establishing branch mints of the United States, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial on the subject, reported a bill to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers in the late war to relinquish their lands, and locate other lands in lieu thereof, and for other purposes; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALKER, from the same committee, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the two per cent. fund accruing to said State upon her admission to the Union; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the memorials of William Coley, Wilfred Knott, Joseph Veazy, and Isaac Hilton, made unfavorable reports severally thereon.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Jacob Gideon, for arrears of pension, made an unfavorable report thereon.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to establish an additional land office in the State of Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Alvarez Fisk and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge.

Mr. FOSTER gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to the lands therein named, &c.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PIERCE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to provide for the punishment of certain frauds committed on persons claiming pensions, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of notice given, asked and obtained leave, and introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice, and referred:

A bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable the claimants to land within the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," passed May 26, 1824, and the act amending the same; and

A bill for the relief of Joseph Cochran.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolutions; which lie over:

Resolved, That the financial policy established at the origin of this Government by the first acts of its legislation, and especially by the thirtieth section of the "Act to regulate the collection of duties," &c., approved by President Washington July 31, 1789, and by the fourth section of the "Act to establish the Treasury Department," &c., approved by President Washington September 2, 1789, was in strict conformity to the plain and frugal genius of a Republic, and to the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

Resolved, That that policy has, by a long series of subsequent acts, been departed from, and ought to be restored in the future administration of the Government. And, therefore,

Resolved, That the Government ought to collect no more taxes from the people, either directly or indirectly, than are absolutely necessary to an economical administration of its affairs.

Resolved, That the taxes paid by the people ought not to be loaned out, by the Government, to individuals or to corporations.

Resolved, That the taxes so paid by the people ought not to be placed by the Government in the custody of agents, who are not made by the Constitution and the laws responsible to the people.

Resolved, That those legal provisions by which the Government was originally required, in the transaction of its own affairs, to receive and to tender, in payment, as money, nothing but that which is made a legal tender by the Constitution, ought to be revived; with those modifications only, as to time and proportion, suggested by the present condition of the country.

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing house rent to the officers stationed at the navy-yards at Philadelphia and New York.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted a joint resolution providing for the settlement and quieting of titles to land in Alabama and Mississippi, derived under the permit or orders of survey given by the Spanish Government; which, after a few explanatory remarks by Mr. C., was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RIVES rose, and begged the indulgence of the Senate while he made a statement somewhat of a personal character, with regard to himself, but not altogether without reference to the public interest. He was not in his seat when the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the resolution lately submitted by him, was read, and therefore had not the opportunity of commenting on it; but he had since seen it in the public prints, and given it a careful perusal. He had seen it moreover, accompanied by some remarks made by a Senator on this floor, who spoke of it as a satisfactory and triumphant refutation of all the charges made in the speech which preface the introduction of the resolution to which it was a reply. Now he rose to state that, notwithstanding this claim on the part of the Senator from Connecticut, that the report was a satisfactory refutation of all the charges that had been made against the Secretary, he considered the report as a substantial admission of everything that had been alleged. Indeed, if the documents to which it referred, should, when laid on their tables, correspond with the description given of them, the conduct of the Secretary will be placed in a more reprehensible light than he had at first supposed it to be. His object now was, to state that when the documents should be laid on their tables, he would be prepared to show to the House and to the country, that taken together, the report and accompanying documents were a substantial admission of the truth of everything he had said.

Mr. KING asked if the Senator made any proposition?

Mr. RIVES replied no. He had only asked the courtesy of the Senate to enable him to make this statement relative to the light in which he viewed the report of the Secretary, in consequence of the remarks made by an honorable Senator at the time the report was read, and to which he had not then an opportunity of replying, which had gone forth to the world treating the report as a triumphant vindication.

Mr. KING observed that there certainly was a great deal of courtesy in this body, but in this instance the Senator was taxing the courtesy of the Senate a little further than usual. The honorable Senator thought proper to preface the introduction of his resolutions by remarks highly condemnatory of the Secretary of the Treasury; and, though he was surprised at it then, he was unwilling to offer any comments that might have a tendency to protract the debate, at a time so unsuitable, from the absence of all information on the subject. The honorable Senator now again repeats his censures, when the subject was not open for discussion. He had hoped that he would have waited till all the information was on their tables, and the subject properly before them. Then a fair occasion would be offered for any charges the Senator might think proper to make, and the discussion could be openly carried on. He regretted much to see the honorable Senator persevere in this course, which had a tendency to prejudice the public mind in advance of the evidence.

Mr. RIVES said he would venture to assert that the files were full of precedents for the course he had taken, though he had not searched for them. The examples were without number, in which a gentleman, on presenting a resolution for inquiry, gave a detailed statement of the views with which he offered it. He did not undertake to condemn the Secretary of the Treasury. His statements were hypothetical merely; and his object was to obtain a more full explanation with regard to the connection between the Government and the bank; and this led him incidentally into a discussion of some of the topics connected with the subject. What did his friend from Alabama now find fault with? He was charged with seeking to anticipate public opinion. Now, who set the example? When the report was read, a member of this body, [Mr. NILES,] who was known to be an indiscriminate supporter of this Administration, right or wrong, gets up and declares that it was a triumphant refutation of every allegation that had been made. Now, when this was done on one side, might he not be permitted to deny it? He merely gave notice of the fact that he considered these documents as substantially admitting the truth of everything he had alleged in his speech; and that he considered them totally in a different light from that in which the Senator from Alabama viewed them; and also that if the documents should turn out to be what they purported, he should hold himself prepared to sustain every allegation he had made.

Mr. NILES, after a few introductory remarks, said that it seemed that the gentleman from Virginia grounded the necessity of making his remarks at this inappropriate moment, on the few observations he (Mr. N.) had made when the report was read, and had taken the opportunity of distinguishing him as an indiscriminate supporter of the Administration, right or wrong. He would not apply the converse of this proposition to the Senator, and say of him that, while he professes to be a friend of the Administration, he was its indiscriminate opposer; he should leave all that to the public. The Senator knew that on one occasion, at least, he was not the indiscriminate supporter of the Administration; but that he had followed the lead of the Senator himself in a measure known not to be acceptable to the President. He did not consider his conduct on this occasion as forming a point for a departure or an abandonment of the principles he had professed and acted on. The Senator seemed to ground his remarks on the necessity of entering his protest against the few observations he had made, as he happened not to be in his place at the time. He regretted that such was the case; it was the Senator's duty to be in his place at the time, as he moved the resolution, and made the charge contained in his speech. When this report came in, he (Mr. N.) moved the printing of an extra number of copies, as well on the ground that it was but an act of justice due to the officer implicated, to the Senate, and to the country, that these documents should be sent out as an answer, not only to the Senator's resolution, but to his speech. The Senator says that in the light in which he views this document, it forms no justification for the acts of the Secretary. Now, if this was true, he ought not to object to the circulation and distribution of these documents. But, from the Senator's remarks, he was inclined to think that he was not much disposed to exculpate the Secretary.

Mr. N. said he could not conceive what the honorable Senator had to complain of, or what had called for his extraordinary course of proceeding. The document went to the public, accompanied by his remarks, which were in reply to those made by the Senator when he introduced his resolution. Still they were not in the same character with the remarks made by the Senator; they were not made in advance of the evidence, like those of the Senator. The Senator asked who it was that set the example? Why it was the Senator himself, who prefaced a mere resolution of inquiry with remarks highly condemnatory of a public officer. Now, if his remarks were not sustained by the documents, and it was not for him to say whether they were or not, yet his course of proceeding was not to be compared with that of the honorable Senator. The gentleman instituted a certain course of inquiries, and without waiting to get the facts he sought for, according to all the established rules of parliamentary proceeding, and all the principles of justice, he accompanies that inquiry with a speech occupying two hours of the time of the Senate, the whole of which were imputations of the truth of the facts yet to be ascertained. If he understood the sum and substance of it, it went to charge that the Secretary of the Treasury had revived and restored the deposit system, by a connection with the Bank of the United States and others, without any legal regulations, for the purpose of being relieved from all legal restraints in the use of the banks; and that all the professions on the part of the Administration of hostility to a connection with banks were hypothetical and deceptive, that there was no disposition on the part of the Secretary to get along without the aid of banks. That was the gist of the whole speech. Now, if the report sustained all this, his [Mr. R.'s] speech would go before the world triumphantly. But the public would look at the whole matter with regard to the facts, and not with regard to the coloring given to them by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. YOUNG offered the following resolution, which lies over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to report to the Senate detailed statements of the accounts of such of the collectors, receivers, and disbursing agents of the United States as have been reported defaulters to either House of Congress during the late session, together with all delinquencies which have since occurred (with the exception of the case of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the port of New York) including in each case all suspended and rejected items of credit connected with any such account; and which, if passed to the credit of any such defaulter, would cover or extinguish in the whole or in part, the amount of the deficits, which are reported as standing on the books of the Department, against such defaulters; with suitable explanations in each case showing why such items of credit have been suspended or rejected, and why they ought not to be allowed as credits to such defaulters; the said report to include all such suspended or rejected items of credit as are remaining in the said Department up to the present period.

Mr. Y. observed that this resolution was the same in substance as the one submitted by him at the last session, and which had not yet been answered by the Secretary. He now submitted it again for the purpose of recalling the subject to the Secretary's attention. That great injustice had been done to many individuals, and to some particularly in his own State, by reporting them as defaulters when they were entitled to credits, he had before had occasion to state. It might be that vouchers were produced by those persons who had been reported as defaulters, which, not being deemed formal by the Department, were not placed to their credit, and consequently they appeared simply as defaulters in the documents, without there being any reference to the credits which they claimed. Great injustice was thus done to these individuals, by not stating the fact that there were items of credit claimed by them which were not allowed. He could point out men of property, and of the highest standing in his State, who thus appeared as defaulters, while they owed little or nothing to the Government. He knew an instance in which a person, since dead, had been reported as a defaulter for $75,000, and he knew that there was a receipt in the Treasury for $25,000 of this money, which on account of some informality, was not passed to his credit, while there was also a bank deposit of $18,000 not credited for the same reasons. There were other payments, also, in this case, which brought the credits nearly up to $50,000, whilst the default appeared in the documents to be $75,000.

Now he knew that if the credits claimed by these persons were reported at the same time with the charges against them, a great many who now seemed to be defaulters, would not appear in the reports as defaulters at all. We all know (said Mr. Y.) the effect that it has upon the credit and character of a man to publish him as a defaulter to the Government, and the great injustice that was done thereby. Perhaps the Secretary had prepared a statement in obedience to the resolution of the last session. If this was the case, the present resolution, which was drawn up precisely as the one of the last session, would serve to call his attention to it, and to include defaulters who had subsequently become so.

Mr. HUBBARD observed that the Senator was mistaken in supposing that the Secretary had not responded to the call on the subject at the last session. There was a statement, and a very full one, embracing every particular called for by the Senator, sent in at the last session, and it must have escaped the Senator's notice. He had no objection, however, to the present resolution, as it would produce a statement with regard to subsequent defaults.

Mr. YOUNG apprehended that the Senator was mistaken. The statement to which he had reference was made in answer to another call, and did not contain the information that he particularly wanted.

SALT DUTY.

Mr. MORRIS moved to rescind the order made on Friday last for printing certain documents in relation to the salt duty.

Mr. M. said he would state his reasons briefly for offering the resolution to rescind. He objected to the order to print, because it was an order to print a document of the British Parliament. He did not know what effect might be produced by the dissemination of this book—it might be a political one—but he thought it quite enough for us to print the official documents of this Government. If the work was of such vast utility, of such general interest, there were many booksellers in this country who would be glad of an opportunity to publish it. He greatly preferred to leave this matter to private enterprise. He ventured the opinion that if this book was printed for the use of the Senate, not one fourth of the members will open the leaves of it. He was opposed to the duty on salt—every man was opposed to it. He thought there was no need of information on this subject. But suppose we print thirty thousand copies of this document: they become, ipso facto, our property; we can do what we please with them. Suppose, when we go home, each of us would tell our people, we tax you thirty thousand dollars to pay for printing these books; each of you must pay your quota; and when printed, we take them to ourselves, and give them to whom we please. The question resolves itself into this: shall the people—the whole people—be taxed to enable us to distribute books among our friends and acquaintances. He thought the printing was a useless waste of the public money, and hoped the Clerk would be directed not to proceed with it until further ordered by the Senate.

Mr. BENTON observed that this motion to print the papers relative to the salt duties, was an unfortunate one. It was made a few years ago, when the high tariff party was predominant on that floor. It was carried; but the next day the order was rescinded, as it was proposed to do now. He did not then think it strange, because the high-tariff party had the ascendancy. The Senator from Rhode Island, who was then in his place, [Mr. ROBBINS,] was the member who made the motion to rescind. When he introduced this motion a few days ago, he very distinctly stated his object, and called the particular attention of the Senate to it; and so far he had engaged the attention of the members of the body, that all voted with a full knowledge of what the document was. The Senator from Ohio was not present when the motion was made, but he availed himself of the first opportunity to show his objections to it. His objections were, first, because the paper to be printed was a foreign paper. Now the very first thing that this Government ever ordered to be printed was a parcel of foreign papers, relative to the fisheries of England, France, and Holland; and he believed that from that time to this foreign papers had been printed as often as asked for. The Senator from Ohio feared the introduction of foreign politics. Now there certainly was no politics, either foreign or domestic; so that objection had no force. The Senator also objected to the printing of books. Now this happened to be no book at all. It was a document that he had two objects in wishing to print. One was to disseminate among the people information valuable to them; and the other was that it might be used on that floor in support of a bill to abolish the salt tax. These papers were deemed so valuable by the British Parliament, that they ordered them to be printed; and the effect of this publication was, that the salt tax, which had stood for one hundred and fifty years, fell, though the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated in his place that the Treasury could not do without the one and a half millions which the salt tax produced. Such was the effect of spreading before the country the valuable information contained in these papers, that the universal consent was that the salt tax must go on something else, and the tax on that indispensable article was left without a defender. The information collected on this subject, gathered from a vast number of individuals, commencing with men of the greatest eminence, and going down to the humble individual who with his own hands tended his cow or his sheep, exhibited a perfect union between the results of science and experience, and conclusively demonstrating that the country suffered many ten times over by the tax beyond the amount produced by it to the Government. So much with respect to the publication of the papers and the existence of the tax.

With respect to the effect on agriculture and all its interests, (including the greatest of its interests, that of stock raising,) the repeal of this tax had done more to improve and increase the stock in England than anything that had ever been done for that great branch of national wealth. Everybody knew that the stock of England was in the highest state of perfection, and that we were daily importing the finest specimens of it. It was in vain (Mr. B. said) for us to import these fine specimens without also importing along with it the knowledge necessary to sustain it. One single fact shown in these documents will give an idea of their importance. For instance, it was shown that there were thirty millions of sheep in the kingdom, and that to each sheep was given a half bushel of salt, making fifteen million bushels given to the sheep—given for the purpose of improving its health, its flesh, and its wool, and as a security and defense against the many diseases to which the animal was liable. The same document (continued Mr. B.) went on to show the quantity of salt given to all other kinds of stock, both milk cattle and working cattle, as well as those fattening for the market, together with the quantity used in preserving, improving, and restoring the various kinds of food with which stock is sustained, all of which was ascertained by actual experiment. In short, take the whole paper, and it would be found to be one of the most valuable from the amount of intellect, combining science with experiment, that was comprised in it. It was also a perfect specimen of the manner of conducting accurate investigations by a committee of a legislative body. The effect of publishing these papers in England, as he said before, was to abolish the salt tax there. It would do the same thing here. The effect had been to improve the stock of that country to the highest degree. The same result would be felt here. Now as to the effect of a salt tax, who was so ignorant as to judge of the effect of such a tax by the mere amount levied? He who would so judge knew nothing of political economy. The effect was that the most valuable sun-made salt, which cost only four cents a bushel, and brought into the port of New Orleans as ballast, was taxed double as much as it cost, nearly two hundred per cent. tax. What further? Because the duty must be paid in cash or secured by bonds given by American citizens as security, the importer has to throw the salt into the hands of the regraters or monopolizers, who charge the consumer their own price. The whole business was thrown into the hands of these regraters, who advanced the money to pay the duty, and who put the salt which originally cost four cents a bushel up to fifty cents. What was the second effect? It was to stint the country of its needful supplies. From estimates made some years ago, it appeared that the importations were ten million bushels, while there are twenty million sheep in the country; so that if our sheep received the same supply that was given to the English sheep, there would not be one bushel for the use of man. It was known that our manufacturers of salt would suffer several of their wells to lie idle, that they might make a little, and keep up the price to three and four times as much as it ought to be. The effect of this monopoly had been such in Missouri, that he had known salt to be three dollars for the fifty pounds weight. At Louisville, as he came along, the price was $1 50 for fifty pounds weight, and take notice (said Mr. B.) that that fifty pounds can be put in the compass of a bushel, while the bushel of foreign sun-made salt is eighty-four pounds.

Mr. B. then drew a comparison between the pure salt, made by solar evaporation, and that taken from the salt springs, and evaporated by fire: the first pure and wholesome, the latter containing putrescent, bitter, and poisonous qualities, which the results of the experiments made by the ablest chemists had shown could be removed from the salt by no other means yet discovered than by solar evaporation. The English, he contended, had ascertained, by their experiments, that neither beef, bacon, nor butter, could be preserved by salt such as that made at our manufactories. So much for the effect of this publication in England.

Now as to the cost of the printing. It was well known that the expense of printing a document was caused altogether by the first copies that were printed. The additional copies were nothing more than the mere cost of the paper and lamp-black. He had understood that the publication of this document would not cost more than sixty cents a volume; and this expense he thought trifling, commensurate with the immense value of the information that would be conveyed to the country.

The Senator from Ohio said that if this was a valuable work the people would get it through the means of private enterprise; and almost in the same breath acknowledged that he had never heard of it before. Now, how were the people of the United States to get this volume, when there was but one copy in the country, and that was in the library of Congress? The only way for them to get it was for it to be printed and circulated by order of one of the Houses of Congress.

One of the objects which induced him to move the printing of these documents was, that they might be used in support of the bill for the abolition of the salt tax. Now, (said Mr. B.) refuse to print them, and there was no estimating the cost that would be incurred by the speeches that would be made against abolishing that duty. But (said Mr. B.) print them, and they will throw such a light on the subject, that no man will venture to open his mouth in support of this odious tax.

After some further remarks from Mr. B.,

Mr. KNIGHT made a few observations in support of the motion, but in too low a tone to be heard.

Mr. BENTON, in reply, said that it was not the amount of the tax, but the tax itself, which puts the article in the hands of the regrater. The bounties and allowances to the fisheries, in consideration of the salt tax, were alone $250,000, so that the outgoing from the Treasury at this moment, originating from this tax and dependant upon it, was nearly as much as the tax itself. He hoped there was no gentleman who would wish to keep up this tax on the people of the South and West, because it put money in the pockets of the Northeast; for, strange as it might appear that any tax should be a money-making business, he would undertake to make it plain that this tax was so to some of the people of this Union, and that there was not, at this moment, so unjustifiable a tax in Europe or Asia as this salt tax.

Mr. MORRIS said that the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had not convinced him either of the necessity or propriety of printing this document. It is very apparent that the Senator is already possessed of all the information necessary to show the propriety of repealing the duty on salt; and why not bring in a bill to repeal it at once? He was prepared at once to repeal the duty on salt; and not on salt alone, but on coal, on breadstuffs, on sugar, and on coarse wools: to take the burden of supporting your Government off of the necessities, and to impose it upon the luxuries of life. We make a parade of relieving our constituents from the duty on salt, and at the same time impose on them a duty to print foreign books. He referred to another document that was printed a few years ago, of which a vast number was circulated to enlighten the people of this country on the abuses of one of the Departments of this Government: he meant the report of the Committee on the Post Office. In one section of the country the leaves of this document were used for wadding for the cannon employed in celebrating a Democratic victory. In his neighborhood they were used in wrapping up tea, coffee, sugar, and other groceries. This was the proper mode, they said, to circulate such a document.

We make many professions of economy, and talk much about the necessity of retrenchment! Why, sir, when I look around me, and see the gorgeous drapery over your head, the extravagant covering on your floor, the immense expenditure on the area inclosed by your iron railing, I ask myself who pays for all this? Why, sir, the people. We are here, sir, in the service of the people; and to convince them that we are doing something for them, every now and then we send them a document which is printed at their own expense. Sir, I am one who does not believe in the constitutionality of protecting duties, and one who thinks that the expenses of the Government should be raised from luxuries; and I ask the Senator to bring in his bill for the repeal of the salt duty, and it shall have my support. Is he afraid of what is termed the compromise act? I acknowledge the power of no law to restrict our acting for what we deem the public weal. Are the rights of the people compromised? Are my rights compromised? No, sir; I come here a free and independent Senator, prepared to pass any law, if I can carry a majority with me, that I may deem necessary for the public good.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, observed that as he was called on to vote upon this question he should give briefly the reasons which would govern his vote. He confessed he had heard with some surprise the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, as he had recollected the manner in which the resolution was introduced, and especially the manner in which the Senator from Missouri called the attention of the Senate to it, and stated the objects he had in view. The Senator from Ohio, it was true, was not in the Senate at the time, and therefore did not hear the remarks which accompanied the motion. For his part, he was disposed to have all the light on the subject that could be obtained, the more so as he resided in a part of the country where the oppressions of the salt tax were felt in a higher degree than any other. He had long been of the opinion that it was just as reasonable to tax the light of heaven, as to tax salt; and being in favor of an entire repeal of the duty, as he ever had been, he was anxious to disseminate as widely as possible such information as would bring about a universal sentiment throughout the country in favor of that measure. With regard to the question as to the power of the Senate to order the printing of documents necessary to elucidate the subjects on which they were about to legislate, was too clear to be disputed. Did any Senator doubt the power of the body to print documents which were to be the basis of legislative action? Surely there was no doubt as to the power. He did not undertake to say that they had the right to print books for the individual use of the members. Indeed he had never given a vote for printing any such books; but here the case was different. It was proposed to print a document calculated to throw light on a very important subject, and necessary not only for their own information, when legislating with regard to it, but highly necessary for the information of the people at large. Then as to the question of expediency. He apprehended that the people did want light on the subject of this salt tax. He apprehended that but few of his intelligent constituents were aware of the extent to which they were oppressed by the tax they were paying for the use of this indispensable article of subsistence, or of the extent to which the monopoly of it was carried. In the first place, the works from whence the domestic salt came, with which his part of the country was supplied, were monopolized—were in the hands of a single man, who worked but one of his many wells, in order to keep up the price. This was not unusual; for he had heard of instances where the proprietors of these wells were paid by the salt speculators to keep their wells idle to prevent a sufficient quantity from being made to bring down the price.

Mr. BENTON said that it had been proved in a document laid before the Senate, that salt made at Holstein was sold as cheap below the Muscle Shoals, after all the expense of transportation, as at the place where it was made.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama. Yes, sir; and it is the custom to sell on higher terms at the manufactory than at a distance, where their salt meets the foreign salt. Then at what rate do we buy our salt? Ordinarily at $1 50 for a bushel of fifty pounds weight. And what was the cost of manufacturing the article? We have it from the highest authority—one of the individuals who manufactures salt—that it can be manufactured at a cost not exceeding twelve cents per bushel. Then what was the cost of transporting it to Holstein? Why, comparatively nothing.

Mr. C. then made an estimate of the quantity consumed in his section of the country, and the amount of the tax, which, in one single county, was more than the cost of printing these documents? Should he then hesitate about incurring this small expense—small in comparison with the enormous amount of the tax—when the object was to disseminate such information as would aid in the removal of it. For one, he should vote against rescinding the resolution.

One of the individuals whose evidence was laid before the Senate, some years ago, said that the average cost of production of the article was not more than six and a quarter cents per bushel; and yet we are to be taxed this enormous amount for the benefit of speculators and monopolizers, who always take advantage of the existing state of things, and in some parts of the country have extorted as much as three and four dollars a bushel. Indeed, he had heard of one instance when eight dollars per bushel was extorted, it being at that particular season of the year when the people were putting up their year's provisions. Mr. C., after speaking of the combinations between the proprietors of the wells and those who sell the salt, asked what sort of protection was needed by the manufacturers? Were they not sufficiently protected by the cost of transportation from the sea-board across the mountains? It would be a day of gratulation to the whole country when this odious tax should be abolished, and he was so anxious to see it done that he would not hesitate at the trifling cost of printing the papers which he thought would aid in accomplishing that desirable object. The cost of the whole publication would not amount to the cost of the salt tax in one single county in his State.

Mr. PRESTON said that the argument of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] amounted to this: the salt tax is a bad one; and, therefore, Mr. Blair must have a job of eighteen or twenty thousand dollars. Now, sir, I am as much opposed to this tax as the honorable Senator is; and when the proper moment arrives, I will show it; but I cannot see the necessity of throwing this job into the hands of the Government printer. What is the excuse for ordering the printing of this document? To enlighten the public mind! Then why not print works in every department of political economy to enlighten the people? Why not, instead of giving the public printer this paltry job of $20,000, give him a job of half a million at once, to put him beyond the reach of contingencies? He knew, from personal experience, how apt we are, when giving the public printer a job, to imagine a necessity for doing so. He himself had to place a check of principle on his tendencies in this matter. If we undertake to enlighten the public mind, the true way would be to enlighten the people on all subjects of free trade. He knew how easy it was to be economical in the abstract; to make professions of retrenchment of expenditure in the general; but when it came to particulars, when it encroached upon some darling interest of our own, how easy it was melted. It would give way at once to a two per cent.; it would give way to a question of printing. With the strong feeling he had to protect the Government from extravagance, he felt bound to oppose the printing, and would vote in favor of rescinding the order.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that he really was not aware when he spoke that he was expressing sentiments calculated to excite the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] to a degree of warmth so unusual, and to a course of remarks not altogether warranted by the rules of deliberative bodies. The gentleman sat out with saying that he (Mr. C.) assumed that the salt tax was a bad one; and that, therefore, they must pay Mr. Blair sixteen or eighteen thousand dollars. Was it possible that the Senator wished to impute to him the desire to print documents merely for the purpose of giving money to the printer of that body?

Mr. PRESTON disclaimed any such idea, and said that what he meant to convey was, that it was a logical deduction from the position assumed by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he had assumed no such position. He took a practical view of the subject, and supported the printing of the documents on the ground that their publication would disseminate information valuable to the country, and eminently useful to the body as a basis for legislative action. We have been assured (said Mr. C.) by the Senator from Missouri that his intention is to bring in a bill to abolish the salt tax. Was it, then, extraordinary that he and others who concurred in opinion with him, that policy as well as justice required the suppression of this grievance, should desire the publication of information that would be valuable to themselves as well as to their constituents? The gentleman asked, why not publish documents in relation to the tax on coal and sugar? The answer readily was, that it would be time enough to do so when they should see the practical utility of such publication, and that when there was a design on foot to abolish these taxes, it would be time enough to publish documents connected with those subjects, provided there were any of sufficient importance. How long was it since the Senator from South Carolina entertained these ideas with regard to economy in printing? If he was not much mistaken, the Senator was here when the celebrated and voluminous Post Office document was printed. Did not the gentleman vote for that printing, which cost three or four times as much as the printing of the documents now in question would cost? By what process of reasoning did he come to the conclusion that that voluminous report, never read by one man in a thousand, could be printed with a view to economy, while it would be extravagance to print this? He was willing to have his views as to economy tested by his votes here, and he should not fear the judgment of the country, or a comparison with the Senator from South Carolina. When the proper time came for testing his principles on this subject, he would not hesitate to act as he had always professed that he would, and he trusted that he should have the cooperation of the Senator from South Carolina, in accordance with the pledges just given by him.

The gentleman asked whether the tax of six cents a bushel had imposed on the people of Alabama the enormous extortion of eight dollars per bushel for salt? Sir, I had reference to what took place many years ago, when I spoke of as high a price as eight dollars a bushel—twenty years and upwards, when the tax was much higher than now. But, put it in the power of individuals to monopolize the article, and extort from the consumers the price they want, and what is the consequence? Why, a few years ago, three or four dollars per bushel was extorted from the people of the town where he resided. He was aware that the tax had been reduced; but it was his object, as it should be that of the people of this country, to abolish it entirely.

Mr. C., after some further remarks, said that the only question with him was whether this information was necessary for the legislation of the Senate and for the interests of the people. If such was the fact, he would always give it to the public, whether it was contained in this or in any other document. He was not aware of the cost of the publication, but from what had been stated in the course of the debate, it would be very inconsiderable in comparison with the amount of the salt tax paid in one of the counties of Alabama.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was not present when the order to print this document was adopted, and therefore did not hear the remarks of the Senator upon the occasion of introducing it. He now understood the printing was to be followed by a bill for the repeal of the duty on salt. As a preliminary, it is necessary to inquire, ought the salt duty to be now repealed? He thought there was not a Senator within the sound of his voice who would say it should be. The Secretary of the Treasury has told us there is a necessity for the most rigid economy, and he told us truly; for, with all our resources, it would be difficult work to get through the next three years. If the duty on salt was not to be repealed at present, but to come up in the general question in 1842, where was the necessity of printing this document so far in advance, when it would be lost and forgotten before the subject came up for consideration? The duty on salt was going off gradually, and as rapidly as the duty on other articles; and every person conversant with the subject knows that duties should be taken off, as well as laid on, gradually. This was necessary on account of our mercantile and manufacturing establishments. Mr. C. regretted that the motion to rescind had been offered. He would prefer that some gentleman present when the motion was adopted should move a reconsideration, and that the subject might be referred to the Committee on Finance, that they might report on it with reference to a general system. He was utterly opposed to taking up such great questions one by one—piecemeal. He thought they should be taken up and acted on as one entire system. He felt that they were all questions of the highest magnitude to the whole Union, but especially to the southern section of it. He was averse to any course of policy by which the South would lose the advantages received by the compromise. He was of opinion that some general and permanent system should be adopted, but that the present was too early to move in the matter. He thought that the Administration, or its friends in that body at the next session, should take the lead in this matter; if they did not, he himself would be prepared with a proposition on the subject, but he would cheerfully lend his assistance to any proposition which he should deem right, or nearly right.

He hoped that the Senator near him [Mr. MORRIS] would adopt his suggestion, and that some Senator who was present at the adoption of the order would move a reconsideration that the whole subject should be sent to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS observed that he should vote for the motion to rescind, and for a very obvious reason. He had no objection to gentlemen having light, but he was not for purchasing it at so dear a rate. He understood the mover of this proposition to state that the printing of these documents would cost eighteen or twenty thousand dollars. That was a large sum of money to appropriate to such an object. It ought to be very valuable to cost so much money. He was not present when the Senator from Missouri brought forward his proposition, and, therefore, had not the satisfaction of hearing him the other day. It was not until the Senator from South Carolina addressed the Senate that he knew what was the immediate object in view. He understood now that the Senator from Missouri had intimated the intention of following up the publication of the documents with a bill to repeal the duty on salt, and the fishing bounties dependent upon it. Now, when the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] said that this involves considerations of profound interest to the country, he was entirely right. These fishing bounties were coeval with the existence of the Government, and were founded on the soundest principles of national policy, and when the occasion served he would be found ready to vindicate them. When the question of repealing the duty on salt came up, he for one was ready to meet it openly; and whenever that matter should be deliberately examined into and the facts comprehended, the result would be entirely different from what had been anticipated in to-day's description. What led them to believe? why that the high price of salt in the western country was owing to the duty, though it was purchased abroad at a nominal price. This low price was true with regard to some inferior kinds of salt only. The Senator from Alabama spoke of the price of salt being $1.50 in his country, and of the numerous oppressions practiced there in forestalling the article. Now were they to understand that the duty was the cause of all this? Mr. D. then went into an argument to show that the duty was not the cause of the high prices. He understood the Senator from Alabama to say that no foreign salt reached his country. How then could the duty cause the high prices?

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that where the steamboat navigation extended, foreign salt was carried. It was brought to the foot of the Muscle Shoals in considerable quantities; but it was not much carried beyond that. He did not ascribe the high prices to the amount of the duty. He spoke of the duty as being a principal cause of enabling individuals to monopolize the domestic article.

Mr. DAVIS said he was happy to hear that the Senator from Alabama did not attribute the high prices to the duty. He thought, if the candor of the gentleman had suffered him to go a little further, he would have stated that the duty had nothing at all to do with these prices.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that surely the Senator must misunderstand him. He did not say that the duty caused the high prices, but that the duty, operating with other causes, had produced the effects he spoke of.

After some further remarks from Mr. DAVIS, contending that the duty had nothing to do with the high prices of salt in the western country,

Mr. BENTON said that some observations which had fallen from the Senators from South Carolina and Massachusetts would require a brief answer on his part. First, as to the condition of the Treasury, and how far it could dispense with this tax. That was a matter of indifference. Supposing the importation to be about five million bushels, the tax, at six cents, would produce something like three hundred thousand dollars. Now, he did not exactly know what the fishing bounties were, but when he looked at them last they were something like half a million, and then increasing. Now, as these fishing bounties and the tax must stand or fall together, there would be no great difference to the Treasury in the repeal. As to the effect of suddenly taking off a duty of six cents a bushel, why that was done a few years ago without any inconvenience being felt. The gentleman said there was no difference as to the price in consequence of the diminution of duty that had already taken place. That was very true. There would be no difference as to the price whether the tax was one cent or six cents. To bring the price down, the article must be kept out of the hands of the regraters, and this could not be done so long as there was a duty of one cent. With respect to the effect of taking off the tax by a single operation, that had been tried in England when the price had risen to sixpence sterling. One half was struck off at six months, and the other half at the end of six months thereafter, and the effect had been most beneficial. The Senator from Massachusetts spoke of the cheap salt as that of an inferior quality. Now, exactly the contrary was the fact. It was the pure sun-made salt, brought from the Mediterranean, that was so cheap, and that which came from England was the poisonous, bitter stuff that they found not good enough for home consumption, and so exported it. All this could be learned from these documents if they ever saw the light. We had a salt tax of about twenty cents a bushel in 1797-98, when we had a Federal Administration, a standing army, and the alien and sedition law; but when Mr. Jefferson came into office, he recommended that the salt tax should be "suppressed," using the term that is applied to vice. Mr. B. then read the law repealing that tax, which he said he should make the model of the bill he was about to introduce.

VOL. 7.....No. 6.

When this tax was put on again, it was put on as a war tax, and he well remembered the saying of the venerable Nathaniel Macon, which was characteristic of the man, that though it went on as a war tax, it would be hard to get it off as a peace tax. Mr. B. said he proposed to offer for the consideration of the Senate a bill which would be a copy of the one just read; and here (he said) we can put one finger on the hinge on which the whole question turns. It was the fishing bounties on which the salt duty rested, and which had kept it in existence to this day. He now gave notice to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis,] that he would bring up this question, and then enable the gentleman to maintain the position he had taken by him this day, and he might prepare himself for an answer. Before a man can get this fishing bounty from the Treasury, he must take an oath that he has paid an equivalent on the salt duty, and it was because these fishing bounties would have nothing upon earth to stand on, after the duty is repealed, that such great opposition is made to so just and necessary a measure. Yet, sir, while the South and West is not only taxed, but the whole business is thrown into the hands of the regraters to extort what they please, and stint the country, the people of the Northeast make money out of it. Mr. B. here made various statements to prove that the country was stinted in the article of salt, and referred to the fact that the pork market at Cincinnati opened at $6 50, and fell to $4 50 in consequence of the want of salt to cure it, and this, too, while pork at New Orleans was selling at twenty-seven dollars.

Mr. MORRIS said that, in accordance with the suggestion, he was willing to withdraw the motion to rescind, with a view to the order being reconsidered, and the subject referred to the appropriate committee. He would remark that he thought the Senator from Missouri was mistaken in the cause to which he attributed the depression of the price of pork in the Cincinnati market. He had never heard in that section of the country that the tax on salt was considered onerous.

The price of pork had fallen, not in consequence of the salt tax, but principally on account of the exertions of the friends of a sound currency, among whom the Senator from Missouri bore so conspicuous a part. It was the substitution of a sound and healthy currency in place of the expanded paper system which had led to the fall of prices. The farmers do not like paper, and they are now getting something like money for their produce. This was the reason; and for the efforts of the Senator on that occasion, and his agency in bringing about this state of things, he has my most hearty thanks. He concluded by saying he would withdraw the motion to rescind, if he had the unanimous consent of the Senate to do so.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, objected; and as the motion could not be withdrawn but by unanimous consent, the question on it was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 15.

After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned till Wednesday.

To the Reporters for the Globe:

GENTLEMEN: Statistical statements, made in debate, are difficult to be reported with accuracy, and therefore it was easy for several errors to creep into your report of my remarks on the salt duties a few days ago. I here correct some of them as being material to the sense of what I said, and to avoid giving erroneous information.

1. As to the quantity of salt imported into the United States: the report represents me as saying ten million bushels, when it should be five to six million, and about the same quantity made at home, so that the whole supply of the Union was ten or eleven million bushels; the whole of which would be needed for our twenty million sheep, if salted as the English sheep are.

2. As to the prices to which salt had risen, on some occasions, in Missouri: the report says, three dollars for fifty pounds weight, which fifty pounds weight might be put into a half bushel measure. This is correct, but it required circumstantiality as to time and place, to wit: that it occurred in November last, and about one hundred and fifty miles above St. Louis.

3. As to the price of salt in Louisville, as I came on to Congress, this fall: the report ascribes me $1 50 as the price, it should be one dollar, with the qualification of being easily put into a half bushel measure.

4. The report speaks of the putrescent, bitter, and poisonous ingredients, which remain more or less in all salt made by the boiling process in contradistinction to the natural crystallizing process under solar evaporation. This is all right, only bitter should be bittern.

5. As to the amount of the fishing bounties and allowances, the report ascribes to me the sum of half a million per annum as their probable amount; it should be a quarter of a million.

6. As to the duty on salt in England, when it was abolished by Parliament: the report says sixpence a bushel; it should be thirteen shillings and sixpence.

7. As to the price of mess pork in New Orleans, and pork falling in the northwest, while rising in the market to which it was to be sent: the report says the market in Ohio opened at $6 50 and fell to $4 50 per hundred, while mess pork in New Orleans rose to $20 a barrel, and this because of the scarceness and dearness of salt. This is all right, except that mess pork rose to $27 a barrel in New Orleans.

Yours, respectfully,
THOMAS H. BENTON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 31, 1838.

Mr. HAYNES asked the consent of the House to submit a motion to go again into Committee of the Whole on the President's message, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, on whose motion the rules were suspended, and the House agreed that when it adjourns to-day, it will adjourn to meet on Wednesday at the usual hour.

Mr. HAYNES then renewed his request, but it being objected to by Mr. BRONSON, on account of its being resolution day, Mr. H. withdrew it till the States should be called through.

RESOLUTIONS.

The States were then called in their order for resolutions.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, under suitable regulations, postmasters to receive, in addition to the postage now payable, such amount on letters carried by mail, destined to be sent abroad, as may be required to be paid to packets or steamships for their transportation to foreign ports, and such amounts also as may be required to be paid for their transmission in foreign countries, which additional amount shall be paid by the postmaster of the port from which such packets or ships may sail, to the agents or persons by whom such letters may be forwarded.

On motion of Mr. NOYES, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of Major Sylvester Churchill, of the United States Army, for extraordinary services as inspector general with the army in Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, in the years 1837 and 1838.

Mr. CUSHMAN submitted the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein,) That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the said States, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, namely: That no person shall be capable of holding, or of being elected, to any office of honor, trust, or profit, either civil or military, legislative, executive, or judicial, under the Government of the United States, who shall hereafter fight a duel, or send or accept a challenge to fight a duel, the probable issue of which may be the death of the challenger or challenged, or shall be a second to either party, or shall in any manner aid or assist in such duel, or shall be knowingly the bearer of such challenge or acceptance.

The resolution having been read twice, Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. GRENNELL inquired if a motion to postpone to a day certain would not take precedence?

The SPEAKER said it would not.

Mr. BOON moved that the resolution be printed; which Mr. JOHNSON accepted as a part of his motion.

Mr. ADAMS called for a division of the question; for though he should vote for the printing, he could not consent to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GRENNELL demanded the yeas and nays; whereupon

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, withdrew his motion, and the resolution was ordered to lie over under the rule.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of New Hampshire, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Elisha Hoyt.

On motion of Mr. GRENNELL, it was

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of War, of the 23d of December last, on the subject of the claims of the State of Massachusetts for militia services and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CUSHING submitted the following resolution:

* Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House—

1. The correspondence, if any, which has been had between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain, or the military or civil authorities of either, in relation to the troubles in the British Provinces of Upper or Lower Canada, and to alleged violations of neutrality on the part whether of Great Britain or of the United States, or any of the officers, subjects, or citizens of each.

2. The correspondence had, or measures taken by the Executive, if any, regarding citizens of the United States made prisoners of war, at any time, in any of the insurrectionary movements of Upper or Lower Canada.

3. Whether the Government of Great Britain has made reparation for the seizure and destruction of the steamboat Caroline, within the waters of the United States, and the murder of American citizens on board the same by a band of armed invaders from the province of Upper Canada, acting under the orders and authority of the Colonial Government of said province?

4. Whether the Government of the United States has entered into negotiations with that of Great Britain, for the purpose of arresting and preventing the further distribution of presents and payment of war subsidies by the latter Government to the Indian tribes within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of the United States; and if so, what has been the result of the said negotiations.

5. Whether the Government of the United States has given to that of Great Britain the stipulated notice to annul and abrogate the convention of the 6th of September, 1827, under cover of which, and of the convention of the 20th October, 1818, the Hudson's Bay Company has proceeded, with permission, or by connivance of the Government of Great Britain, to establish military posts in the territories of the United States beyond the Rocky Mountains.

6. Whether the Government of the United States has taken any measures, and if any, what, to adjust, settle, and mark the boundaries between the United States and the British Provinces in North America, from St. Mary's Falls, between Lake Huron and Lake Superior; and so northwardly and westwardly along the frontier of the State of Michigan and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, to the Rocky Mountains.

7. What correspondence, if any, the Government of the United States has had with that of Great Britain or any of its authorities or officers, or with the government of the State of Maine, in regard to the late survey or investigation of the northeastern boundary line of the United States by the government of said State.

8. Whether any correspondence has recently passed between the British and American Governments relative to the free navigation of the navigable rivers coterminous to the United States and the British possessions in North America, or of the navigable rivers running in part or in whole through the territories of both Governments; and if so, the results of the same.

Mr. PETRIKIN inquired whether, under the rule, it was in order for gentlemen to offer resolutions embracing two subjects?

The SPEAKER said he did not so consider these resolutions; and decided it was not out of order to entertain them.

The resolutions were then laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUSHING then said the discharge of his particular duties as a member of the House had called his attention to another subject of inquiry, perfectly unexceptionable in itself, and of the deepest immediate interest to the whole Union, and more especially to the States of the Southwest. He asked that the resolution of inquiry should be read, in order that the House might judge whether they would permit him to offer it at this time, which he would not ask if the subject were not one of pressing, immediate importance.

The House assenting, Mr. C. offered the following resolution; which was read, and lies over one day, under the rules:

Whereas, in the message of the President of the United States, at the opening of the Eighteenth Congress, it was, among other things, avowed and proclaimed as the settled national policy of the United States that, "in the wars of the European Powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do;" that, "with the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected;" that "we owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety;" that "with the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power, we have not interfered, and shall not interfere; but with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European Power, or in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States;" and that "it is impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference:"

Resolved, therefore, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if the same be not, in his judgment, incompatible with the public interest, what explanations the King of the French has rendered to the United States in relation to the recent blockade of a part of the coast of the Mexican Republic by France; the treatment of vessels of the United States, public or private, by the blockading squadron; the reduction of the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa; and the ulterior views and designs of the French Government respecting the Mexican Republic. Also, to inform the House whether he has proffered, to either of the contending parties, the mediation of the United States in the premises; and to communicate any correspondence on the subjects aforesaid which may have passed between the Government of the United States and that of France.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing the name of Jacob Adams, of Massachusetts, on the pension list.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be instructed to consider the expediency of providing by law that the distribution of arms procured by virtue of the act making provisions for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States, passed April 23, 1808, should be made according to the apportionment of the representation of each State and Territory in the Congress of the United States, or by some other rule of apportionment which shall practically be more equal and just, among the different States and Territories, in respect to their population, subject by the laws of Congress and of the States and Territories respectively, to enrollment in the militia, and the active performance of military duty therein.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be instructed to consider the expediency of increasing the annual appropriation by Congress for the purpose of providing arms and military equipments for the whole body of the militia of the United States.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the quantity and description of arms which, since the conclusion of the last war with Great Britain, have been procured and distributed to the States and Territories respectively, pursuant to an act "making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States," passed April 23, 1808; and also to state by what rule of apportionment the arms have been distributed; the manner and times in which the returns of the militia have been received from the States and Territories; whether these returns have been made annually, and, in default of such annual returns, what rule has been adopted in making the distribution, and for what number of years any of the States have neglected to make such returns; and also, that the Secretary communicate to this House an abstract of the latest returns of the number of the militia of the States and Territories, respectively, with their dates, together with an abstract of the quantity and dates of the issue of arms upon such returns.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law in relation to the pay of jurors attending upon the courts of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS asked the House to take up and consider the resolution offered by him on the 6th of December, calling for information in relation to the controversy between Andrew Stevenson and Daniel O'Connell; and sent to the Clerk's table the following letter, received by him through the post office, which was read:

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, December 19, 1838.

SIR: In looking over the proceedings of Congress, I observed that you have introduced your fantasies again, by trying to impeach the character and honor of our Minister to England, Mr. Stevenson. Mr. S. is a relative of mine, one who I hold dear to me, and shall call you to account when I get to Washington. I think, and so does the country, that Mr. S. was condescending too much a friend of devility, such as I consider you; and on my arrival in the Metropolis, I shall shoot you the very first time you rise to make any remarks about my friend Mr. S. So soon as Mr. C. Perry returns to the United States, you will die certain. You are better suited for a cell in the mad-house, than a seat in one of the highest places on earth. I am no party man myself, and would to my God were to see you in the act of speaking disrespectfully of my friend. If you mention their names, no explanation will satisfy me, only to take your life, and that I shall do in the presence of the assembled wisdom of the world. I expect to fight a duel in the District of Columbia before the session is ended, if you open your broad-trap about that mode of settling affairs I shall be much induced to avow you, as on most anything else. I shall be in Washington by the 2d of January, 1839.

B. J. CONVALD.

J. Q. ADAMS.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. REED moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. THOMAS hoped gentlemen would not agree to suspend the rules, in consequence of this miserable quizz being practiced upon the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWSON deeply regretted that a letter of this character, which all must perceive was fictitiously signed, should be made a serious matter of. It is evidently a quizz, and should not have been presented.

Mr. ROBINSON asked whether it would be in order to amend the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of considering the letter?

The SPEAKER decided that it would not. The letter was not before the House for consideration.

Mr. CRABB moved to postpone the matter until the 2d day of January.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. BOON moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table, and upon that motion,

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The House then laid the motion to suspend the rules upon the table.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That no order, resolution, or rule of this House, upon the subject of petitions, shall apply to resolutions from State Legislatures.

On motion of Mr. TILLINGHAST, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing and so regulating the postage on letters and papers carried by mail, as that the same may be made payable in money of the United States, dispensing with fractional parts of cents.

On motion of Mr. CRANSTON, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law in relation to ship letters, so as to make it the duty of the captain, or other person having returned ship letters, to return them to the postmaster of the port where he shall arrive.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the House of Representatives of the causes why it was not in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain, by means of the weekly and monthly returns, and other records in his office, the defalcation of the late collector at New York, when it first commenced, or at the different settlements afterwards, before his term of office expired. That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested, also, to communicate to this House a copy of his circular, addressed to the collector of New York in November, 1835, and copies of all the returns made by said collector in compliance with said circular; and also to inform the House of Representatives whether the practice of entering on the books of the Secretary of the Treasury, kept in his own office, the quarterly accounts current of the customs, as soon as received by the First Auditor, has been discontinued, and when discontinued; and whether the practice, by the Secretary of the Treasury, of calling for the account current of the customs received at the office of the First Auditor, and the quarterly accounts of collectors, and of comparing the same with the several returns rendered to the Secretary by collectors, in conformity with the requisitions of his circular of 14th October, 1818, and repeated on the 12th November, 1835, has been discontinued by the Secretary of the Treasury, and when discontinued; and also whether, if the practice of properly arranging and comparing the said last-mentioned returns of collectors with each other, in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, has been discontinued, and when discontinued; and that the Secretary of the Treasury also inform this House whether, in his opinion, the defalcation of the late collector of New York could have been concealed from the naval officer of that port, if the said naval officer had "examined the collector's abstracts of duties, and other accounts of receipts, bonds, and expenditures," with ordinary and proper caution, before certifying the same, and had faithfully performed the duties imposed by law upon naval officers; and that the Secretary of the Treasury also communicate to this House copies of all correspondence between the Treasury Department and William M. Price, late district attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York, in relation to any bond or bonds executed by the securities of said Swartwout for the faithful performance of his duties as collector of New York; and also to communicate copies of all bonds executed to the United States by the sureties of said Swartwout.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of remunerating the legal heirs of William Anderson, for property taken or destroyed by the Cherokee Indians about the year 1788; and that the papers on file of the House in relation thereto be referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing a survey of the mouth of the Catskill creek, in the Hudson river.

On motion of Mr. BRODHEAD, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to Elhathan Sears, of the State of New York, the amount equal to five years' pay under the resolve of Congress of the 22d of March, 1783.

On motion of Mr. BICKNELL, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of granting to John Keith, a soldier of the Revolution, a pension; and that the papers on file in his case in the War Department be referred to the said committee.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Joanna Bartlett, the widow of Aaron Bartlett, deceased, a soldier of the Revolution; and that the papers in this case now on file in the War Department be referred to the said committee.

On motion of Mr. HAMMOND, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Christian Brougher, of Pennsylvania, a soldier of the revolutionary war.

On motion of Mr. HENRY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so changing or modifying the law with relation to postage that all public newspapers shall be carried in the mail free of all charge within the limits of the counties where they are respectively printed and published.

Mr. WISE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of nine members, and to be elected by ballot, be constituted, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire and report whether there are sufficient grounds on which to found an impeachment by this House of Levi Woodbury, the Secretary of the Treasury.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. CUSHMAN objected.

So the resolution, giving rise to debate, lies over one day.

Mr. WISE offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of building steam ships of war.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee lately appointed on the subject of the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing the mode for selling said lands, so as to require that all the bids of purchasers shall hereafter be made or proposed in writing, in the same manner as bids are now made for contracts in the Post Office Department.

Mr. ADAMS offered the following amendment:

And that they inquire into the frauds that have been practiced in the sale of the public lands, and to report to this House a remedy therefor.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, accepted this as a modification.

Mr. SNYDER expressing his desire to speak to this question, the resolution, as modified, lies over one day by the rule.

Mr. STANLY offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, petitions praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, in the Territories, or in the States, with a "view" of affecting slavery within the District of Columbia, or in the States, or in the Territories, ought not to be received, entertained, or considered by the House.

Resolved, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly, and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories, or in any manner, with a view of disturbing or overthrowing that institution either in the District of Columbia or in the Territories or in the several States, is equally unconstitutional, and beyond its legislative competency, and is an infringement of the rights of the States and a breach of the public faith on which they entered into the Confederacy.

Resolved, That all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories, or to "regulate" the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, either with a view of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories, or in the States, are in violation of the Constitution, destructive of the fundamental principle on which the union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress; and that, as such, no petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper touching or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery, as aforesaid, or to the abolition thereof, shall be entertained or considered by this House.

Resolved, That "the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances," as secured by the first article of the amendments of the Constitution, does not give to citizens of non-slaveholding States the right to petition Congress to interfere with or abolish slavery, either in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories, or in the States, inasmuch as slavery is denied by the citizens of the slaveholding States to be a "grievance," and was not so considered at the time of the formation of the Constitution.

Mr. STANLY, in offering the resolutions, said his object was to supply the omissions in the resolutions which caucus No. 2 had made. Those now offered by him contained the substance of those which caucus No. 1 had agreed upon, and afterwards reconsidered.

The SPEAKER decided that, under the resolution of the 12th instant, these resolutions must be laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS. Sir, are these resolutions to be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

So the resolutions were laid on the table.

The State of South Carolina having been called, Mr. PICKENS rose and said, that he had prepared a resolution he intended to present, in relation to the movements of the French squadron on the coast of Mexico; but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had introduced one that covered the ground, and Mr. P. would withhold his. He was rejoiced to see the resolution coming from the quarter it did. A question of great importance might arise, in which the South-western States would feel a deep interest, and we could not look to it too soon.

On motion of Mr. OWENS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to Mrs. Eliza Mackey, for property destroyed in the service of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Mrs. C. Rhodes, the widow of a revolutionary officer.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, and the Postmaster General, be, and they are hereby, respectively required to report and communicate to this House, as soon as practicable, what were the expenses of their respective Departments, including every item of expenditure, in the year commencing on the 4th day of March, 1828, and ending on the 3d day of March, 1829, and so on for each successive year up to the 4th of March, 1838, and from thence up to the 1st day of January, 1839, placing each item of expenditure under its proper head; and further, to report and communicate the number of clerks and other officers, of every description whatever, belonging to their respective Departments, with the salary or pay of each, in each year, separately, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1828, and so on for each successive year up to the 4th of March, 1838, and from thence up to the 1st day of January, 1839.

The resolution would regularly lie over one day, but Mr. W. asked the House to consider it at this time.

Objection having been made,

Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 106, nays 61. (Not two thirds.)

So the rule was not suspended.

Mr. W., by leave, then modified his resolution, by adding thereto the following:

And further, to report how much (if anything) has been allowed as extra pay to any clerk or other officer of their respective Departments, at any time within the foregoing periods, and for what services those extra allowances were made.

On motion of Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the holding of a special term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Eastern Tennessee, at Knoxville, on the third Monday of April next, by the district judge of said district, at which term to hear and try all issues and matters cognizable at the regular term of said court; and that said committee inquire, also, into the expediency of authorizing the judges of the circuit courts of the United States to direct said courts to be adjourned over to some future day, designated in a written order to the clerk of either of said courts, in case of the prevalence of a dangerous and general disease at the place where said court is usually holden; and that the adjournment over by the clerk, in the absence of the judges, shall have the same force and effect as if the judges had been present.

On motion of Mr. STONE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of the volunteers or drafted militiamen who are now, or who may hereafter be, called into the service of the United States; also, those who are, or may have been, employed by the General Government for the purpose of removing the Cherokees out of the States of Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Alabama, and settling them west of the Mississippi, as well as those volunteers who have just returned home from the Florida war; also, to provide by law for the payment of all horses and their equipment at their first valuation, which have either been turned over to the quartermaster's department by order of General Jesup, or which have been lost by death, or become unfit for use on account of the Government having failed to furnish forage sufficient to sustain them.

Mr. BOND offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a copy of a circular issued by the Comptroller, in the year 1821, and which is referred to by the said Secretary in his report to the President of the United States, dated 6th November, 1838, in relation to the default of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs of the port of New York, being the same circular which, in said report, is alleged "to have tended to remove a check on the collector." And also, to inform this House whether the bonds set forth in document No. 10, appended to said report, were included in any return, bond account, or other account of said late collector, communicated by him to the Treasury Department, and if so included, at what time such returns or accounts were communicated to said Department. And also, whether three certain Treasury warrants, amounting in the aggregate to $39,240 05, received by said late collector, during the years 1834 and 1835, mentioned in paper No. 15, annexed in said report, appear in any quarterly or other account or return rendered by said collector to said Department; and if so, to communicate a copy of such return or account to this House.

Mr. B. asked that the resolution be considered at this time; and, objections having been made, moved a suspension of the rule; but the motion was rejected.

On motion of Mr. Allen, of Ohio, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the commencement of a breakwater at the harbor of Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, on the plan suggested in the report of Captain Henry Smith, on the files of the War Department.

On motion of Mr. HARPER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the number of land offices in the State of Ohio.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the power of designating the time, place, and manner, of elections for Representatives is expressly given, by the Federal Constitution, to the Legislatures of the States, respectively, subject to no supervision or control, except by law of Congress only; and that, in the exercise of this power, the State Legislatures may constitutionally fix the time of election subsequent to the expiration of the Congress preceding that for which such election is to be holden.

2. Resolved, That neither the Federal nor State executive can constitutionally anticipate, supersede, or change, the times of election as fixed by the State Legislatures.

3. Resolved, That this House has not the constitutional power, either legislative or judicial, by its own action alone, to annul, suspend, or impede the operation of an act of a State Legislature, fixing the time, place, and manner of election for Representatives.

4. Resolved, That no resolution or action of this House can deprive the people of any State of their constitutional right of electing Representatives to Congress at the time designated for that purpose by the Legislature of such State; that the claim of such power, on the part of this House, would be a dangerous encroachment upon the rights of the States, and its exercise a direct and palpable violation of the Constitution.

5. Resolved, That the constitutional jurisdiction of this House over the subject of representation is a limited one, embracing the questions of election, qualification, and return, only; and that, in judging of election, this House is bound to judge in accordance with the act of the State Legislature regulating the time, place, and manner thereof.

6. Resolved, That, in accordance with a constitutional act of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, prescribing the time, place, and manner of election for Representatives to Congress, and in compliance with all the provisions of said act, an election was holden in November, 1837, for two Representatives from said State to the Twenty-Fifth Congress, at which election SERGEANT S. PRENTISS and THOMAS J. WORD were duly elected, possessed the constitutional qualifications, and were duly and legally returned.

7. Resolved, That the resolution of this House, adopted on the 5th day of February last, denying to said PRENTISS and WORD seats in this House as members thereof, was a dangerous attack upon the elective franchise, in derogation of the rights of the State of Mississippi, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and a mischievous example to future times.

8. Resolved, therefore, That said resolution be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. HAYNES said there were many important questions in these resolutions which required consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, inquired of the Chair whether the mere fact of a single member rising in his seat and stating that there were matters in the resolutions which required consideration, would subject those resolutions to be laid over under the words of the rule which speak of resolutions "giving rise to debate."

Mr. HAYNES said it was obvious that such resolutions could not pass without debate.

The SPEAKER said that, under the rule, the resolutions would lie over.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, said he was desirous to have the resolutions considered soon, as his own position was somewhat peculiar. He must, therefore, move to suspend the rule for the purpose, at least, of fixing a day certain for their consideration.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas fifty-nine, noes not counted.

So the rule was not suspended.

Mr. LYON asked the permission of the House to present a letter received by him from a soldier of the Revolution, who resided in his district, (Samuel Earle,) inclosing $157 in Continental money. The writer stated in his letter that he had served as a regular soldier during the war of the Revolution, and had received for his services, at the close of the war, only $200 in Continental money, a part of which he inclosed. He stated further, that he was in indigent circumstances; was upon the pension list at the rate of eighty dollars a year, but that this sum was not sufficient for his support, and that he had received no bounty land.

Mr. L. said he was charged by this old soldier to present the money inclosed to Congress, accompanied by his respects, and with a request that the amount, with interest, might be paid to him.

He presented the letter, together with the money, and offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the communication from Samuel Earle, a soldier of the Revolution, inclosing the sum of $157, in Continental money, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with instructions to inquire into the nature and extent of his claim, and into the expediency of increasing his rate of pension.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the further improvement and completion of the harbor of St. Louis, Missouri; also, an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Missouri river; and also, an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri river from its mouth as far up said river as Fort Leavenworth.

Mr. M. also presented the petition of Richard Graham and John O'Fallon, of Missouri, asking the passage of a law for their relief, as the securities of E. T. Longham, late surveyor general at St. Louis, so far as to authorize the proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department to adjust with them, according to the principles of equity and justice, the amount that may be due the United States on their bonds, as the securities of the said Longham.

On motion of Mr. TOUCEY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a territorial government for said District.

On motion of Mr. SLADE, it was

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, containing the annual estimates for the year 1839; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KENNEDY submitted the following preamble and resolution; which, under the rule, lie over one day:

There having been well-founded complaints, from divers quarters, of manifold corrupt practices in the holding of the late elections, which corrupt practices are said chiefly to have consisted in attempts to bribe some of the voters in said elections, by means both direct and indirect; in the open and active interference of the officers and agents of the General Government in the conduct of the said elections; and in the employment of threats, blows, and riots, designed to prevent the lawful exercise of the privilege of voting; and as the preservation of the purity of the elective franchise is of the deepest concern to the safety of Republican Government; and as it is the duty of the National and State Legislatures to guard the right of suffrage against all improper influences; to preserve it from all official interference; from bribery, both open and secret; from all practices that have the effect to hinder or prevent the free and fair expression of the popular will; and as it is the especial duty of Congress to look to "the correction of those abuses which have brought the patronage of the General Government into conflict with the freedom of elections;" Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of — members, be appointed by the Chair, and that it shall be their duty to inquire into the existence of such abuses as, by common report, are charged to have been practiced in the exercise of the elective franchise in various quarters of this Union; and that, for the purpose of this inquiry, said committee be authorized, if they should deem it necessary, to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of this House adopting as a rule of decision for settling the validity of contested elections, some provision or regulation which, with suitable limitations, shall, in effect, determine that actual bribery practiced in any election for a seat in this House by the reported successful candidate, or by his friends or supporters (the same being clearly proved to have procured for such candidate a certain number of votes,) shall vitiate said election, and be held as conclusive ground for setting the same aside, and for referring it again to the people; that said committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of this House adopting as a rule of decision in cases of contested elections, some provision or regulation which, with suitable limitations, shall, in like manner, determine any election to be void, and proper to be referred again to the people, wherein it shall be made to appear by ample proof that a certain number of voters friendly to the successful candidate in such election shall have been prevented by threats, blows, or riots, from casting their votes in said election.

Resolved, further, That said committee be instructed to report a bill to this House for the remedying of all such disorders as the experience of past years has shown to have disturbed or affected the freedom and fairness of elections, the remedy whereof may be within the constitutional power of Congress; and that said committee be especially directed to incorporate into said bill suitable provisions or clauses by which it may be enacted that the salaries of all officers of the General Government, and all stipends, commissions, wages, or emoluments, agreed to be paid by the Government to any of the public servants or agents appointed by the Executive, shall be subject to the condition that the said officers, agents, or servants shall abstain from the exercise of any kind of interference with the elections, either of the Federal Government or State governments, further than the quiet and orderly casting of their respective individual votes, under the penalty of forfeiting, for a specified period, one half of their salaries, stipends, commissions, or other compensation as aforesaid; and that every officer, agent, or servant of the General Government, appointed by the Executive thereof, shall be rendered subject to the said forfeiture, who shall be proved before some competent judicial tribunal, and upon the verdict of a jury, to have busied himself in any manner whatever in the ordering, adjusting, or proceeding of any public meeting held with a view to the promoting of any political election, or to have attended such meeting knowing its character, or to have subscribed any sum of money for the defraying of the expenses of any such election, or to have attended at any polls on the day of such election, and there have employed himself in procuring the voters or others to vote, or to have joined in any processions, meetings, or assemblages, got up for purposes connected with any such election.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following joint resolutions; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to open a correspondence with the Government of the confederacy of Central America on the subject of connecting the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico with that of the Pacific ocean, by means of a railroad or canal, or both, and the propriety of authorizing the construction of a railroad or canal by the united capital of the citizens of the two countries.

Resolved, That the President be requested to enter into treaty stipulations with said Government, providing suitable guarantees for the protection of the interests of our citizens who may invest capital in the construction of such railroad or canal.

Resolved, That the President be requested to depute some one or more officers of the engineer corps to survey any route or routes for a railroad or canal connecting the Gulf and Pacific: Provided, Said Government consent thereto.

Mr. SOUTHGATE submitted the following joint resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, shall form a part of the Constitution of the United States, to wit: That, if any officer of the United States shall embezzle, or in any way convert to his own use, the money of the United States confided to his care, he shall, on conviction thereof before any of the courts of the United States by the verdict of a jury and the judgment of the court, be declared forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States, or of exercising the right of suffrage.

On motion, the House then adjourned till Wednesday, at twelve o'clock.

Select Committee on the subject of past donations of public lands, quality surveyed, plans for dividing it or its proceeds, &c.—Messrs. JOHNSON of Maryland, DAVEE, ATHERTON, CUSHING, TILLINGHAST, HOLT, ALLAN of Vermont, PARKER, AYCRIFF, POTTER, MILLIGAN, ROBERTSON, CONNOR, PICKENS, HAYNES, MENEFFEE, McCLELLAN of Tennessee, HAMER, JOHNSON of Louisiana, BOON, PRENTISS, SNYDER, LEWIS, HARRISON, YELL, and CRAIG.

WEDNESDAY, January 2, 1839.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial from two hundred and twenty-seven ladies of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, praying the passage of a law to prohibit the slave trade, and to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McK. said he had been instructed to move that it be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill to that effect.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the motion to receive was laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented the petition and memorial of the New York Peace Society, asking Congress to act as arbiter between France and Mexico, and to take measures for having a Congress of nations, for the purpose of forming an international code of laws; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a large number of the merchants of Philadelphia, requesting Congress to establish Newcastle as a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of Dr. John Campbell White, praying Congress by legislation to correct an error in his naturalization papers; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of a number of physicians residing in the western part of Pennsylvania, asking that vaccine may be transmitted by mail free of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of C. Newbold, President of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, asking Congress for an appropriation for clearing out and deepening the harbors at the outlets at either end of the canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROANE presented the memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of Georgetown, asking an extension of time to redeem their small notes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. R. also presented a memorial from the same authorities, asking Congress to grant an appropriation to aid in building the bridge across Rock Creek; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. R. also presented the memorial of Jonathan Elliot, praying for remission of interest on the purchase money of a lot bought from Government.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of a number of the citizens of the Territory of Florida, praying for the passage of a law for the adjudication of titles to land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented the petition of Betsy Crosswell Shtmah, of New York, asking a pension for services performed by her husband in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRIS presented the memorial of Richard Elliot, praying for a reconsideration of the memorial and documents in his case on the files of last session; which, on Mr. M.'s motion, were recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of Sarah Smith, of Vermont; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Daniel B. Bush, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to authorize the selection of lands for the University of Michigan, instead of other lands heretofore selected, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to authorize the location of preemption certificates given by the register of the land office at Batesville, Arkansas, under act of May 26, 1824, on any public lands in the State of Arkansas, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. F. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to authorize the inhabitants of township eight north, range thirty-two west, in Arkansas, to enter a section of land upon surrender of the sixteenth section for military purposes, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. F. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to set apart a belt of land on the borders of Missouri and Arkansas, for the purpose of bounty lands to such volunteers as may serve in defense of the frontier, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill for the relief of the heirs of Francis Newman, late collector of internal revenue and direct taxes in Maryland, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the memorial of Brigadier General John R. Fenwick, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition and papers of John S. Billings, introduced a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of J. and W. Beeson, and others, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to amend an act under the 14th article of the treaty with the Choctaws of 1830," reported a substitute for the bill.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the message of the President on the subject of the Pea Patch Island, in the river Delaware, reported a joint resolution authorizing the purchase thereof; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. B. also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the widow of Lieutenant Colonel Thompson, who was killed in battle with the Seminole Indians, requested that the committee might be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Alvarez Fisk, and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LINN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill creating a new land district in the State of Missouri, and altering the boundary of the western and southwestern land districts in the same State; which was read twice, and, with the documents relating thereto, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MOUTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Madam De Lusser, and their legal representatives; which was read twice and referred.

On motion of Mr. SPENCE, the memorial of George McCall, on the files of the last session, was again referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate at what time the claims of the volunteers from the State of Alabama for horses lost in the service of the United States in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians will be examined and settled under existing regulations, and whether any, and what further provisions are, in his opinion, necessary to a prompt and just settlement of said claims.

On motion of Mr. WALL, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the removal of certain obstructions in the navigation of Newark bay and the river Passaic, in the State of New Jersey.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the resolutions of the Common Council of Newark on the foregoing subject were referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the quantity of public lands sold since the 30th September, 1837, which had at the time of sale been subject to entry for five or more years prior to such sale, designating between the several quantities of land which had, at the time of the sale thereof, been subject to private entry for five, ten, fifteen, and twenty or more years; and also, designating the State or Territory in which each description of land so sold is situated. Also, that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report the number of land offices now existing under the authority of the United States.

On motion of Mr. LINN, it was

Resolved, That the select committee on the Oregon Territory be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the laws of the United States over said Territory.

On motion of Mr. FULTON, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to the Senate all the information in the possession of the War Department, in relation to the present situation of the Memphis road, and what further appropriation will be necessary to complete the same.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of compensating Hiram H. Lewis and William T. Lewis for two horses lost by them while in the military service of the United States.

The documents relating to the above were also, on Mr. T.'s motion, referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making payment and compensation to Colonel A. G. Morgan, of Missouri, for military services in Florida, and for raising troops for service in that Territory.

On Mr. B.'s motion the papers relating to the foregoing were referred to the same committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, offered the following; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to compensate and pay the militia who were called out by authority of the Indian agent at Logansport, Indiana, in the year 1836, to suppress a threatened riot at the payment of the annuity at that place, and that the papers relative to the same, on the files of the Senate, be referred to said committee.

PUBLIC DEFAULTERS.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. YOUNG, calling for information from the Secretary of the Treasury, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. YOUNG stated that this resolution was similar to one which had been offered at the last session, and to which he was not aware there had been any answer received. He had been informed, however, that information had already been collected, and would shortly be presented to the Senate, which would render unnecessary a part of the resolution; and he therefore proposed to substitute for it the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to report to the Senate, in addition to the information called for by the resolution of February 15, 1838, in relation to public defaulters, all defalcations which have since occurred, (with the exception of the case of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the port of New York,) and the names of the securities in each case; the suspended and rejected items of credit claimed by such defaulters; the reasons why the same have not been passed to their credit; the measure, if any, adopted in each case to enforce payment; and the probability of ultimate indemnity to the United States.

The bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the two per cent. fund accruing on her admission into the Union, was read a third time and passed.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. LINN gave notice that on to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill to establish a port of entry at Fort Independence, Missouri, and to allow a drawback on such merchandise as is used in the Indian trade, and the trade with the internal provinces of Mexico.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that he would, in the course of a few days, ask leave to introduce a bill for the payment of the Missouri volunteers.

Also, a bill to repeal the duty on salt, and the fishing bounties dependent thereon.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands was taken up, as the special order; when

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, offered a resolution to refer it back to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to that committee so to amend it as to restrict its benefits to actual settlers.

An animated discussion ensued, in which Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, WALKER, CLAY of Alabama, BENTON, and MERRICK, participated.

Before the question was taken on Mr. CLAY's proposition,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 2, 1839.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the Journal be corrected, so as to enter thereon the request made by him on Monday, to take up and consider his resolutions calling upon the President of the United States for certain information in relation to the controversy between our Minister to England and Daniel O'Connell; and also that he sent to the clerk's table, to be read, a letter, threatening him with assassination, and that the said motion was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS, in reference to that letter, said he was satisfied it was a quiz, and was purely fictitious, for no individual of that name was known in Alabama.

Mr. ROBERTSON bore testimony to the same fact.

Mr. ADAMS respected the motives of the gentleman from Alabama in vindicating the people of his State; but Mr. A. could not consider a threat of assassination, whether true or false, as a quiz, unless treason be a quiz, or murder be a quiz, or forgery be a quiz.

Mr. A. was here called to order.

The motion of Mr. ADAMS was rejected—ayes 70, noes 87.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if this motion would be entered on the Journal?

The SPEAKER said it would.

Mr. HAYNES asked leave to move that the House go again into committee on the President's message.

Objection being made,

Mr. H. moved a suspension of the rules: lost.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CUSHMAN asked leave of the House to make a statement in reference to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Objection being made,

Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules, assuring the House that he would not occupy two minutes. The rules were suspended—ayes 114, noes 38.

Mr. CUSHMAN expressed his acknowledgments to the House, and said he would not trespass upon its patience so long as it had taken to decide the question. All he wished to say was this: that on Monday a resolution was offered by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] proposing to raise a select committee to investigate the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to inquire whether they can find sufficient evidence upon which to found articles of impeachment against him; and this committee was proposed to be chosen by ballot. Mr. C. at the time objected to the then consideration of the resolution, not because he was opposed to investigation—far from it; and he knew at the time the Secretary of the Treasury would solicit an investigation whenever the House desired to have it; and he would say now that, if the gentleman would so modify his resolution that the committee should be raised forthwith in the usual way, Mr. C. would withdraw his proposition. He was further authorized to say, that so anxious and so desirous was that distinguished officer of the Government to have an investigation into the whole of his official conduct, that Mr. C. would now say that he would not interpose an objection to raising the committee, if it was done in a reasonable time.

Mr. MENEFEE called the gentleman to order. He had leave to make a statement, and he was making an argument.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I have done.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, inquired if the gentleman's argument was a subject of reply? [Cries of "Order!"] I ask leave, then, to make a statement.

Objection being made, Mr. P. moved a suspension of the rules; on which motion

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 97, nays 97, not two thirds:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Clowney, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darling, Deberry, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Foster, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harper, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lyon, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKonnan, Menefee, Milligan, Mitchell, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Elmore, Evans, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hamer, Haynes, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Thomas B. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—97.

Mr. WISE stated that he was not present when the gentleman from New Hampshire made his statement; and as he also wished to make one, he asked of the House a similar indulgence for a very short time.

Objection being made,

Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. PICKENS begged leave to say that he voted against the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire, and he could not now vote in any other way.

Mr. WISE notified the House that his object was to make an inquiry as well as a statement. He wanted to know whether the statement made by Mr. CUSHMAN was by authority of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The question was then taken; and the House refused Mr. Wise's request—yeas 90, nays 89; the motion requiring two thirds:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Ayer, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Buchanan, John Calhoun, William F. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darling, Davies, Deberry, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Foster, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Robert M. On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the Chair was authorized to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the House then went into committee on the President's annual message, (Mr. ADAMS in the chair.)

The question was on the series of resolutions moved by Mr. HAYNES to distribute the various portions of the message among the appropriate committees.

Mr. CUSHMAN, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House for some time in reply to Messrs. WISE and PRENTISS.

Mr. DUNCAN then obtained the floor, and on his motion the committee rose and reported.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a statement of the number and compensation of the clerks in the Post Office Department.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, laid on the table. On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 3, 1839.

Mr. WHITE, of Tennessee, appeared in his place in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the War Department, transmitting a report from the Second Auditor, containing a statement of the contingent expenses of the Military Academy; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the motion to receive was laid upon the table.

Mr. McKEAN presented another memorial, remonstrating against the admittance of any new State into the Union whose constitution tolerated the institution of slavery; and also remonstrating against the annexation of Texas.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, again raised the question of reception.

The PRESIDENT said there was no question of reception before the Senate.

Mr. KING stated that the rule had been distinctly settled by the decision of the Senate, and did not now admit of a question. Whenever a petition, in which the subject of slavery was involved, was presented, the established course had been for the Chair, and it was its duty, to state the preliminary question, "Shall the petition be received?" and when this was done, a motion had always been made to lay this question of reception on the table; which being carried, the matter was ended. This was the parliamentary rule; but it was usual for the Presiding Officer to dispense with it, and take the reception as for granted, when the petition related to a matter about which no objection would be made.

The PRESIDENT did not consider it the duty of the Chair to state the preliminary question as to the reception of petitions, and thought it matter with which the Chair had nothing to do. It had been the unvarying rule of the Chair, when petitions involving the subject of slavery were presented, to state to the Senate distinctly their purport, in order that some member present might raise the question of reception.

Mr. RUGGLES said that, coming from the section of country he did, he felt compelled to object to the course indicated by the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING.] The petition does not involve the question of domestic slavery in the States or Territories of this Union, but was of a very different character, appertaining to questions connected with the general legislation of the country. Though he was very unwilling that the question of slavery should be agitated or discussed in that body, he thought the present memorial should be received and have a proper reference.

Mr. McKEAN said that the petition did not involve the question of the abolition of slavery, and he supposed it did not come under the general rule. His intention was to lay it on the table, and move its reference at a subsequent period. He now moved that the petition be received; and on that question he asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, said that he understood the prayer of the petition to be, that no new State may be admitted into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery; that is, (said Mr. W.) one branch of the petition is on the subject of slavery; therefore, I move to lay the question as to its reception on the table.

Mr. MORRIS wished to obtain the decision of the Chair on a question of order. He wished to know if, after the yeas and nays had been demanded on the question of reception, a motion to lay the question of reception on the table could deprive him of the right of recording his vote on the former question? He had always looked on this motion to lay on the table as a violation of the constitutional rights of a minority of that body. The Constitution, in express terms, says that the yeas and nays shall be called upon the requisition of one fifth of the members present, and he protested against the right—not the right, but the power—of a majority to deprive him and the one fifth of the members of their constitutional right of recording their votes on any question that might be presented to them. He did not wish to occupy time in discussing this subject on the proposition at present before the Senate, but he would take a future occasion to bring it up in such a manner as to be enabled to present his views on the subject, and place himself in a right position before the country.

The PRESIDENT then stated his decision on the point of order. The Chair (he said) now finds, after a reference to the parliamentary rules just pointed out to him by the Senator from Alabama, that it is his duty, on the presentation of a petition, first to put the preliminary question, "Shall the petition be received?" It was the duty of the Chair always to put this question, except in those cases where, by universal consent, there would be no objection made to the reception of the paper. The Chair, in all cases where petitions in reference to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia were presented, had distinctly stated to the Senate the subject involved, in order that the attention of those members who objected to their reception might be directed to them, and that they might have an opportunity of raising the question of reception. The Chair, on the present occasion, acted, as he believed, in accordance with his duty, believing that the usual difficulty was not involved, and that, as the petition related to Texas solely, it was to be received sub silentio, as had been the case with other memorials in reference to that subject. The question now raised by the Senator from Ohio was, whether the question can rightfully be taken on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, to lay the motion for reception on the table, after the yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of reception. On this question the Chair had no doubt. The question raised by the Senator from Mississippi was one of those privileged questions that it was at all times competent for the Senate to sustain. It was like a motion for adjournment or for recommitment, which could be made at any stage of a proceeding.

Mr. McKEAN then asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the question of reception on the table; which were accordingly ordered.

Mr. NORVELL said that the decision of the Chair, that the motion to lay the question of reception on the table, even after the yeas and nays had been ordered on that question, was undoubtedly correct. A motion to lay any subject on the table was always the first privileged motion, except that of adjournment. But he desired to say that the petition under consideration embraced two propositions, neither of which was before the Senate. It remonstrated against the admission of any State into the Union hereafter the constitution of which sanctioned slavery. No Territory or State was now, or likely to be at this session, before Congress, or the Senate, asking for admission. The memorial remonstrated against the annexation of Texas, with slavery, to this Union. It was well known that Texas had withdrawn her application for annexation. It was not probable that it would ever be renewed by Texas; and he presumed that none of us here had any disposition to renew it for her. In voting, therefore, to lay the question of reception on the table, his object was simply to dispense, for the present, with the consideration of subjects which were not before the Senate, and not likely to come before it for a long time.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, and Williams of Mississippi—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clayton, Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Williams of Maine—14.

So the motion to receive the petition was laid on the table.

Mr. McKEAN presented a petition from sundry women of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, praying that Congress would so regulate the commerce between the several States as to abolish the sale and transfer of slaves from one State to another.

The PRESIDENT then stated the preliminary question, "Shall the petition be received?"

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, moved to lay the question on the table.

Mr. McKEAN called for the yeas and nays; which were accordingly ordered; and the question was decided in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clayton, Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, and Swift—12.

So the question of receiving this petition was laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of Cadwallader Evans, of the city of Pittsburg, son of the celebrated Oliver Evans, stating that he has discovered an infallible mode of preventing the explosion of steam boilers, and asking that his invention may be investigated by a committee of the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred that part of the President's message in relation to Indian hostilities, reported a bill to provide for the occupation and settlement of a part of the Territory of Florida, which was overrun by the hostile Indians; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to provide for additional clerks in the Post Office Department; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Joseph Espy.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, the Committee on Agriculture was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of a number of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for an act of incorporation to enable them to raise silk; and it was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Logan.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mrs. Bateman, the widow of the first man killed in the war of the Revolution, praying for a pension, and the papers of William B. Worden on the same subject, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MOUTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Juan Pelgar; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. LINN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Thomas A. Smith; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. LYON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Henry H. Marsh, Francis La Venture, Ebenezer Childs, and Linas Thompson; which were severally read twice and referred.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. RIVES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, "the terms of any agreements," informal or otherwise, which may have been entered into between the Secretary of War and the Bank of the United States respecting the sale or payment of one or more bonds of that institution held by the United States relative to the proceeds; of the deposit thereof in said bank; the periods when, and the proportions in which they were to be drawn out, the places where to be paid, the manner in which they were to be disbursed; the time when such arrangements were entered into, and whether with the bank directly, or with an agent or agents of the bank; and, in the latter case, the name or names of such agents, together with all the correspondence which may have passed between the Secretary of War and the bank or its agents in relation thereto. Also, copies of all circulars issued or instructions given by any branch of the War Department relative to the mode or medium in which the money arising from the sale or payment of the said bonds or any part thereof, was to be disbursed, and, as far as can be conveniently stated, the amount which has been disbursed in the notes of the bank under the said instructions, and the objects for which such disbursements were made, together with all correspondence which may have taken place between the Secretary of War and the Bank of the United States or its agents, or between him and any other Department of the Government on the subject-matter of these instructions.

Mr. PRESTON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate such proceedings as have been had under a law of the last session providing for the examination of inventions designed to diminish or prevent the calamities resulting from the explosion of steam boilers.

Mr. MERRICK submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire and report what alterations, if any, the progress of improvement and the altered condition of the city of Washington render it expedient and proper to make in the charter of said city.

Mr. MERRICK said that the charter would soon expire by its own limitation, and Congress have power to revoke or amend it in any form they may think proper. There is considerable dissatisfaction as to the inequality of the distribution of power in the present charter, as a great change has taken place in the condition of the city since it was incorporated, and a very large portion of the population of the city is not represented in the corporation. He made these remarks for the purpose of attracting the attention of those interested, and he hoped that the citizens might attend before the committee, and present their views on the subject. He hoped there would be no objection to its reference to the Committee on the District, where the subject would receive the proper investigation.

The resolution was then adopted.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands came up as the unfinished business, the question being on the adoption of the proposition to recommit with instructions, offered yesterday by Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky.

On this question the debate was continued by Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, CLAY of Alabama, WALKER, NILES, BENTON, and WILLIAMS of Mississippi; when,

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the question on Mr. CLAY's proposition was divided, so as to take it first on the recommitment, and secondly on the instructions.

On the question of recommitment the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, and Williams of Maine—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—20.

Previous to the vote being taken on the question of instructions,

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, and by general consent, the number of acres to be granted to each actual settler was left blank in the instructions.

The question was then taken on the instructions thus modified, and was carried by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Hubbard, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Walker, and Williams of Maine—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—17.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 3, 1839.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, said they had now been in session a month and passed but one bill, and he supposed it was entirely unnecessary for the committees to assemble any more, as they had already more business on the Calendar than they could act upon; and, believing that, he asked leave to offer a resolution providing that, in future, until otherwise ordered, the House should meet at 11 o'clock, a. m. instead of 12, m.

Objection being made, Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rules, and called for the yeas and nays; they were refused, and the motion to suspend was rejected.

Mr. MAY asked the House to take up Mr. CAMBRELENG's resolution for a select committee to investigate the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout. [Cries of "No! no!"] Mr. M. therefore moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays, so that (he said) it might be seen who was in favor and who was against the investigation.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said if the gentleman would suffer the morning business to go regularly on, that subject would be reached sooner than by a motion to suspend.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired of the Chair whether, if the rules were suspended, the special order of to-day would not be set aside.

Mr. MAY withdrew the motion.

On motion of Mr. CRABB, the bill to reorganize the district courts of the United States in the State of Alabama was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with the provisions of an act of Congress, inclosing a report from the Second Auditor, showing the expenditure of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the military establishment during the year 1838.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CONNOR, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of Patrick Green.

Mr. C. also reported the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department.

Mr. LINCOLN was at a loss to perceive how that committee could claim cognizance of this matter, which belonged to the Committee on the Public Buildings. The latter, too, he stated, had had the subject under consideration, and would shortly be prepared to bring in a bill for the same object.

Mr. CONNOR did not know that the right belonged to any particular committee; but certainly it fell more properly within the jurisdiction of the Post Office Committee. Moreover, two years ago that committee had reported a bill to the same purport, to which no objection was then made, and which bill was only lost for want of time. The Committee on the Post Office were not tenacious; but they were now ready to report a bill, and intended to ask its immediate consideration; for it was but recently that the present temporary building was likely to be destroyed by fire, a wing to the roof of another building in the vicinity being on fire.

Mr. LINCOLN referred to the terms of the resolution instructing the Post Office Committee to "inquire," whereas the other committee had already considered the subject.

Mr. BOND moved to strike out "Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads," and insert "Committee on the Public Buildings."

Mr. MERCER saw no necessity for instructing a committee to inquire into a subject already before them; and therefore he moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was disagreed to, and Mr. BOND's amendment agreed to; and the resolution, as thus amended, was concurred in.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported, without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act to remit or refund to the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company the duties upon certain railroad iron."

Mr. ALLAN, of Vermont, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to John F. Wiley.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House, as speedily as practicable, all the facts touching the defalcation of General Charles Gratiot, late chief engineer, showing the time when he was first a defaulter, and for what sum; what orders were given stopping his pay in consequence of his default, and when; what orders were given him directing the settlement of his accounts, and when; together with all correspondence on the files or books of his office relative to said Gratiot's defalcation. And that the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House, as soon as convenient, all facts and correspondence relative to the defalcation of any and every civil or military disbursing agent or officer now in service, either in the staff or line, subject to the orders of the War Department, who has failed within the last two years, for a longer period than two months, to settle his accounts in the manner prescribed by law, or who, upon settlement, has been found in arrears to the Government, and has failed to pay over the balance against him when demanded.

On motion of Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the location and satisfaction of the bounty land warrant issued to James Ward, of North Carolina.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House such information as he may have received touching the invasion of the southwestern frontier of the United States, by an armed force from the Republic of Texas.

WISCONSIN ELECTION CASE.

At one o'clock the special order of the day, being the consideration of the contested election for a Delegate from Wisconsin Territory, came up.

The question was on the adoption of the following resolution of the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That James Duane Doty is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from Wisconsin Territory, and that George W. Jones is not so entitled.

The report was made on the 21st of December, and twice postponed at the solicitation of the contestant, [Mr. JONES], till it was positively made the special order for this day.

The report was in the following words:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the order of the House on the subject of the "right to a seat in the House as the Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin," report:

That, by the order of the House as submitted to them, the only question which presented itself was, whether or not the Territory was entitled to a representation by a Delegate? In deciding this question the committee could have no difficulty, and might have absolved itself from further trouble by reporting an affirmative resolution. But believing the intention of the House, in making the order, to have been that the committee should examine the whole ground, and not only report as to the right of representation, but also designate the person who was the rightful representative, they proceeded to perform that duty, and report the following as the result of their investigation. By the act of 20th of April, 1836, which act was to take effect the 4th of July following, the Territory of Wisconsin was organized, and the Territorial government established; and by the fourteenth section of that act it was declared "that a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve for the term of two years, may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the Legislative Assembly, who shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as have been granted to the Delegates of the several Territories of the United States to the said House of Representatives; the first election shall be held at such time and place or places, and be conducted in the same manner as the Governor shall appoint and direct; the person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the Governor to be duly elected, and a certificate thereof shall be given to the person so elected." By virtue and in pursuance of the said act of Congress, Henry Dodge, the Governor of said Territory, (duly appointed,) issued a proclamation, dated the 9th of September, 1836, wherein, amongst other things, he orders and directs that the first election for members of the House of Representatives and Council shall be held on the second Monday of October, then next ensuing; and did also "direct and appoint that, at the same time and place specified for electing the members of said Legislature, there shall be elected, by the voters of the several counties, one Delegate to the Congress of the United States for the term of two years, agreeable to the fourteenth section of the act of Congress." In pursuance of said proclamation, an election for a Delegate in Congress was held, and George W. Jones was duly elected, as appears by the certificate of the Governor, herewith reported, and marked A.

It appears by the Journal of the House of Representatives that on the 5th day of December, 1836, Mr. Jones appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the House as a Delegate from Wisconsin Territory.

From further evidence before the committee, it appears an election for a Delegate to Congress from the Territory of Wisconsin was held on the 10th day of September, 1836, in conformity with the act of Congress and the laws of the Territory, which resulted in the election of James Duane Doty, as appears by the certificate of the Governor, herewith reported, and marked B.

No doubt exists as to the due election of Mr. Doty to serve as a Delegate for a term of two years; but the question presented to the committee is this: When does his term of service commence? On the one side, it is contended that it commences with his election, or at least with the date of the Governor's certificate of his election; on the other side, it is contended that the term for which Mr. Jones was elected in the fall of 1836 does not expire until the 4th of March, 1839; and in support of this view of the case, reference is made to the act of Congress of 3d March, 1817, the first and only section of which now in force is in the words following:

"In every Territory of the United States in which a temporary government has been, or hereafter shall be, established, and which, by virtue of the ordinance of Congress of 13th July, 1787, or of any subsequent act of Congress, passed or to be passed, now hath, or hereafter shall have, the right to send a Delegate to Congress; such Delegate shall be elected every second year, for the same term of two years, for which members of the House of Representatives of the United States are elected."

Reference is also made to the act of 16th February, 1819, in which it is provided that the citizens of Michigan Territory be, and they are thereby, authorized to elect one Delegate to the Congress of the United States; that the person who shall receive the greatest number of votes at such election, shall be furnished by the Governor of said Territory with a certificate, setting forth that he is duly elected the Delegate for the term of two years from the date of said certificate.

Under the act of 1819, Mr. Jones was elected a Delegate for Michigan Territory, in October, 1835, and took his seat at the ensuing session, in December, 1835. By the act of June, 15, 1836, the constitution and State government which the people of Michigan had formed for themselves was accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and she was declared to be one of the United States of America, and was admitted into the Union according to the boundaries therein prescribed, on condition that the boundaries so prescribed and established should receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said State, for the sole purpose of giving the assent required; and as soon as said assent was given, the President of the United States was to announce the same by proclamation; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. A convention of delegates, elected for the purpose expressed in the said act, was held, and gave their assent to the boundaries therein described, on the 15th of December, 1836.

The committee is of opinion that although, in October, 1835, Mr. Jones was elected a Delegate for Michigan Territory to serve two years, yet, in the nature of the case, his term of service could not survive the existence of the corporation he was elected to serve. If the corporation of the Territory of Michigan was dissolved before the expiration of the two years for which he was elected, his office, as well as that of all other territorial officers, expired with it. It would seem to the committee that the Territory of Michigan, as a political corporation, was no more after the passage of the act of 15th June, 1836, organizing and erecting Michigan into a State; for, although there was a condition in that act, on compliance with which only she was to be admitted into the Union, yet that did not derogate from her character as a State, or prevent her from exercising all the powers of a State. Her being a State, and, as such, being admitted into the Union, are two different things. She might be a State, and was a State, exercising all the powers of a State under her own constitution, before she was admitted into the Union, and before the election in Wisconsin in October, 1836. At the time Mr. Jones was elected a Delegate for Wisconsin Territory, in October, 1836, he was not a Delegate for Michigan Territory, for the plain reason that no such Territory was in existence. In December, 1836, he took his seat, and was sworn, as a Delegate from Wisconsin, since which he has served two years—the full period allowed him by law. But it is alleged by Mr. Jones that, under the act of 1817, a Delegate must be elected only for one Congress, and not for parts of two congressional terms; that his term as a Delegate from Wisconsin did not commence until the 4th of March, 1837, and consequently will not expire until the 4th of March, 1839. In this the committee does not concur with him; because it would have been leaving Wisconsin unrepresented for one whole session, contrary to the intention of the people as expressed in electing a Delegate in October, 1836, in conformity with the privilege granted them for that purpose by the act of Congress of April, 1836; and because it does not follow, from the act of 1817, that a Delegate from a Territory must be elected for and serve the same two years for which members from the States are elected; but (although this construction is not given with entire confidence in its correctness) the committee would construe the law to mean that Delegates should be elected for the same length of time as Representatives from the States. This construction is fortified by the fact that, previous to that law, Delegates were elected annually. Such construction will not clash with any provision of the Constitution, as Delegates are so far the mere creatures of law that their term of service may be long or short, and may commence and terminate at such periods as Congress, in their wisdom, may direct.

But if in this construction of the act of 1817 the committee should be in error, still their opinion would induce them to give Mr. Doty the seat, because, as the committee believe, that act has nothing to do with the present contest. It is nothing but an act of Congress, and, of course, subject to the control of subsequent legislation. It was controlled (if Mr. Jones's construction of it be right) by the act of 1819, which directed that the Delegate of Michigan should serve two years from the date of the certificate of the Governor, without regard to the commencement of his term—whether at the beginning or in the middle of a term of Congress. So would it be controlled by the act of April 20, 1836, organizing the Territory of Wisconsin, which gives the power to its citizens to elect a Delegate to represent them in Congress, without fixing any time for the commencement of his services; consequently, according to common construction in all such cases, where an obligation is imposed, or a duty to be performed, and no time fixed for discharging the obligation or performing the duty, it is to be done forthwith; and therefore the inference is that Mr. Jones's duties as a Delegate from Wisconsin commenced with his election in October, 1836, and terminated with Mr. Doty's election in 1838. The act of April, 1836, organizing the Territory, needs the aid of no other; it is perfect in itself, and would seem to be independent of all other acts.

On the whole, after all the consideration which the committee have been able to bestow on the subject, they have no hesitation in saying that considerable difficulty exists in reconciling the provisions of the different acts which may be supposed to have a bearing on the matter; yet they feel a great degree of confidence in two positions: first, that it was the intention of Congress, by the act of April, 1836, organizing the Territory, to afford the people of the Territory the privilege of an immediate representation in Congress by a Delegate to be elected by themselves; and second, that the people of the Territory acted with a view to the enjoyment of that privilege in electing a Delegate in October, 1836. The conclusion would then seem to be that Mr. Jones has served out the term for which he was elected in October, 1836, and that Mr. Doty is entitled to the seat under his election in 1838.

The committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That James Duane Doty is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from Wisconsin Territory, and that George W. Jones is not so entitled.

Certificate of the election of G. W. Jones.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

WISCONSIN TERRITORY, November 1, 1836.

I, Henry Dodge, Governor of the Territory of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that, in conformity with the organic law of Congress, passed April 20, 1836, and agreeable to the fourteenth section of said act of Congress, I have caused elections to be held in the several counties in this Territory for a Delegate to the Congress of the United States, to serve for the term of two years; and I hereby declare and make known that George W. Jones, esq., has been duly elected a Delegate to the Congress of the United States, agreeably to the provisions of said organic law.

Given under my hand and seal, this 1st day of November, A. D. 1836.

H. DODGE, [L. S.]

B.

Certificate of the election of J. D. Doty.

TERRITORY OF WISCONSIN, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.
To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

This is to certify that, at an election held in the Territory of Wisconsin, on the 10th day of September last, in conformity with the act of Congress establishing the Territorial government, and the laws of the said Territory, James Duane Doty received the highest number of votes for the office of Delegate to the Congress of the United States, and is therefore declared to be duly elected.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the great seal of the Territory to be affixed. [L. S.] Done at Mineral Point, this 27th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1838.

HENRY DODGE.

Mr. CRAIG called for the reading of the opinions of Mr. JONES's counsel, (Messrs. Jones and Key;) which was done; and then

Mr. THOMAS moved to amend the resolution by transposing the names, so as to declare Mr. JONES entitled to the seat, and proceeded at length to oppose the conclusions of the report.

Mr. CUSHING was understood to argue in favor of vacating the seat of the sitting Delegate, upon the ground of the irregularity and illegality of the tenure by which he held it, and in favor of the amendment of Mr. THOMAS; and intimated that he would, at the proper time, move a division of the question.

The question was further argued by Messrs. RANDOLPH, CRARY, FLETCHER, and TILLINGHAST, in favor of the resolution as reported by the committee.

Mr. DE GRAFF having obtained the floor, moved the previous question; which motion was sustained, and the main question was ordered.

The question being upon concurring with the resolution as reported by the committee,

Mr. ROBINSON moved a called of the House.

The SPEAKER decided that it was not in order, the previous question having been seconded.

The House then adopted the resolution of the committee by the following vote—yeas 165, nays 25:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayerick, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Belme, Bell, Bicknell, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Broadhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chapman, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Connor, Corwin, Crabb, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushman, Darlington, Dawson, Davee, Davies, Deberry, De Graff, Dunn, Edwards, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Holt, Howard, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kumble, Kennedy, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lincoln, Loomis, Lyon, Marvin, James M. Mason, Sampson Mason, May, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Maury, Naylor, Noble, Ogilvie, Owens, Paynter, Pierce, Peck, Pennybacker, Petrikon, Pickens, Plumer, Potts, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Putnam, Kariden, Randolph, Reed, Reilly, Rencher, Ridgway, Rives, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Shepler, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Spencer, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Swearingen, Taylor, Thompson, Tillinghast, Tius, Toland, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vanderveer, Wagener, Albert S. White, John White, Whitelless, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, Word, and York—165.

NAYS—Messrs. Bouldin, John Calhoun, Coles, Dromgoole, Ewing, Hamer, Harrison, Hawes, Hubley, Keim, Logan, Martin, Maury, McClure, Morgan, Parmenter, Pariss, Pope, Southgate, Stuart, Thomas, Webster, and Christopher H. Williams—25.

Mr. DORR then presented himself at the Speaker's table, and was qualified as the Delegate from Wisconsin Territory.

On motion, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 4, 1839.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. McKEAN presented the petition of a large number of citizens of Erie county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to pass a law authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to build an armed steamboat, to be used as a revenue cutter on the northern lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of General James Leftwich, late of the revolutionary army, praying for an increase of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. R. also presented the petition of certain holders of lots in the city of Washington, praying that a law may be passed authorizing the Mayor of said city to make deeds to them for the same; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of William H. Slacum, of the District of Columbia, asking compensation for his expenses and services in the examination made by him of the territory of the United States on the Oregon or Columbia river, under the orders of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENTON presented several petitions, signed by Colonel Bankhead, Major Kirby, Captain Lovell, and twenty other officers of the Army of the United States, praying that the pay of the officers of the line and the staff of the Army may be equalized.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of William Redman, a merchant of New York, praying that certain duties paid by him may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LYON presented the petition of Joseph Campan, praying that his title may be confirmed to a small tract of land on the border of Lake St. Clair, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, signed by Daniel W. Cox, their President, asking for an appropriation to clear out their harbor at the mouth of the Delaware and Chesapeake canal and in the Delaware; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. LUMPKIN, leave was given to William Fuller to withdraw his petition and papers presented at the last session.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would tomorrow ask leave to bring in a bill to authorize the Portage Canal Company to enter at the Government price certain lands in the Wisconsin Territory, at or near the Fox river portage.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill supplemental to the act entitled "An act to grant preemption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved 22d June, 1830; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALHOUN, in pursuance of notice given, obtained leave, and introduced a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Eihu Hall Bay; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. PRENTISS, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Dennis Trammel; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. BENTON, in pursuance of previous notice, obtained leave, and introduced a bill to authorize payment to be made to certain Missouri volunteers for services rendered in 1829 and 1836; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. FOSTER, in pursuance of previous notice, obtained leave, and introduced a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants, and perfect titles to lands therein described, and to settle the claims to vacant lands unappropriated within the same," passed 18th April, 1806; which was read twice and referred.

[This bill cedes forever to the State of Tennessee all the public lands lying within the "congressional reservation," with an unconditional right of preemption in favor of occupants at twelve and a half cents per acre, and directing the proceeds to be applied to the redemption of outstanding North Carolina land warrants—any surplus to be accounted for to the United States. On the 1st January, 1844, all vacant waste and refuse lands lying within the "reservation," are ceded forever to Tennessee without reserve.]

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. MOUTON submitted the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the erection of barracks in the vicinity of Shreveport, in the State of Louisiana, for the accommodation of such military force as may be necessary for the protection of our frontier settlements in that neighborhood.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into and investigate the causes and impediments which so often obstruct the regular and punctual transportation of the mail to and from the seat of Government on the great leading post routes of the country; and report, by bill or otherwise, such remedy as may be deemed entitled to the consideration of Congress.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate any authentic information he may recently have received in respect to the modes of collecting, keeping, and disbursing public moneys in foreign countries.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred the petition and papers of Hannah Laughter, reported a bill to place her on the pension list; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Claims, to which the same had been referred, reported without amendment the bills for the relief of John F. Scott and John Magill.

Also, with an amendment, the bill for the relief of Charles A. Dodd.

Mr. T., from the same committee, to which was referred the petition and documents of Richard Robertson, of Alabama, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which the memorial on the subject was referred, reported a bill to confirm the title to a certain tract of land in the county of Mobile; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. L., from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Juan Pelgar, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. L. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims, approved May 26, 1824, and an act amending the same," reported the same with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Alvarez Fizk, and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which had been recommitted the bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands, with instructions to amend the same, so as to limit the sales at the reduced prices to actual settlers, &c., &c., reported back the same amended in accordance with the instructions.

Mr. WALKER said he would take this occasion to say that the committee considered themselves restricted by their instructions to the limitation of the sales at reduced prices to actual settlers. It was proposed, however, by the committee to add to the number of those who are to be permitted to purchase at such reduction, those persons who, being actual cultivators, wished to add to their farms portions of the public lands contiguous to them. But this amendment the committee would not propose till the bill was up before the Senate for consideration. Mr. W. then moved that the amendments be printed, and made the special order of the day for to-morrow.

The amendments were then read, limiting the sales of the public lands at the graduated and reduced prices, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to such persons as are, or are about to become, bona fide actual settlers.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, hoped the chairman of the committee would concur with him in postponing the bill till Monday next. This would give gentlemen more time for examining the amendments that had been made, and for preparing others. The gentleman would perceive that the state of the business at the other end of the Capitol was not such as to render one day a matter of very great importance with regard to this bill.

Mr. YOUNG said he would be glad to have an opportunity of suggesting an amendment, which he thought would be acceptable to all parties. That was, to make the same provision in this bill as was made in the existing laws in regard to the entry of quartersections, allowing the entry where the individual made oath that he wanted the land either for his own use, for actual cultivation, or for the benefit of the improvements already held by him. This would be a very useful provision, as there were a number of persons owning small farms who wanted the waste lands contiguous to them, such as marsh lands for pasture, and barrens for timber; and they ought to have the benefit extended to them of purchasing such at the reduced prices.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, observed that the provision suggested by the Senator from Illinois was the very amendment that the committee proposed to offer, when the bill came up for consideration, as had just been notified to the Senate by the chairman of the committee. In relation to the postponement, he hoped the Senate would make the bill the special order of the day for to-morrow, and give that earnest that it is not their intention to permit it to be killed by delay.

Mr. BENTON observed that, to make the bill the special order of the day for any day named, even for to-day, would put it behind a bill (the Cumberland road bill) which was already a special order.

Mr. WALKER said that, under all the circumstances, and as he thought the Senate would probably adjourn over to Monday, he would, for his part, agree to make the bill the special order for that day, provided he had a general understanding, both from the opponents of the bill and from the friends of the Cumberland road bill, that no other business should take precedence of it on that day.

This understanding being generally given,

The question was taken, and the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. RIVES, relative to the transactions between the Secretary of War and the agent of the Bank of the United States, growing out of the sales of the bonds of the said bank, came up for consideration; and, after a debate in which Messrs. RIVES, WRIGHT, KING, and NILES, took part, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 4, 1839.

Mr. MARTIN asked the consent of the House to take up on its passage the amendatory bill to reorganize the district courts of Mississippi; but Mr. CHAMBERS objected.

Mr. MAY moved a suspension of the rules, to take up Mr. CAMBRELENG's resolution to raise a select committee to investigate the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. LEGARE trusted the House would go on with the private business, for they were really doing gross injustice to claimants in thus, from time to time, setting it aside.

The House refused to suspend the rules—yeas 101, nays 88; not being two thirds.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the Committee of Claims, reported a joint resolution in favor of the claim of Captain John Downs.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of David Powers; which was laid on the table.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Frederick Richmond.

Mr. GRAY, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Jechonias Pigot and Benjamin Lecraft, sureties of James Manney, late collector of the customs for the district of Beaufort, in the State of North Carolina.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William A. Whitehead.

On motion of Mr. GIDDINGS, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of John Harmon and William Harmon, and they were referred to the Third Auditor of the Treasury for adjustment.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Smith.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the owners of the British brig Despatch.

Mr. CURTIS, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to remunerate the captors of the privateer Lydia.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill to provide for carrying into effect the convention between the United States and the Republic of Texas, for marking the boundary between them, giving notice that he should call it up to-day.

Mr. LEGARE, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Thomas Sumpter.

Mr. CUSHING, from the same committee, reported a bill to provide for the protection of citizens of the United States residing in the Oregon Territory, or trading on the Columbia river or its tributaries.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to print five thousand extra copies of the accompanying report.

Mr. ADAMS moved ten thousand, which Mr. DROMGOOLE accepted; and the motion was agreed to nem. diss.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Leonard Smith.

Mr. HEROD, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel B. Hugo.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Nick alias Rignal Henry, deceased.

Also, a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James Broadhurst, deceased.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the select committee on the public lands, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be authorized to appoint a clerk, and to have the various propositions which may be submitted for their consideration printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted the following preamble and resolutions; which were referred to the select committee on the public lands:

Whereas the Continental Congress for the then Confederacy of the United States did, by resolution, in the year 1780, recommend to the several States of the Confederacy, or Federal Union, having claims to western lands, a liberal surrender thereof, as a common fund, in aid of establishing the public credit, and to discharge the debt incurred by the then existing war with Great Britain; and whereas the State of Virginia, responding to the said recommendation of Congress, did, on the 2d day of January, by an act of her Legislative Assembly, adopt and submit to Congress, for their consideration and acceptance, the terms and conditions on which that State would surrender to the United States, for the purposes aforesaid, all the lands within the chartered boundaries of Virginia north and west of the river Ohio; and whereas Congress, having the said terms and conditions of cession proposed by the State of Virginia under consideration, resolved, on the — day of September, 1783, to accept the same, with the exception only of a stipulation in said terms of cession requiring the United States to guarantee to Virginia the residue of her western territory lying south and east of the river Ohio; and whereas the State of Virginia, assenting to the proposed exclusion from her terms of cession, did, by an act of her Legislative Assembly, authorize her then delegates in Congress to execute the contemplated deed of cession; whereupon, and in virtue of the full powers vested in them, the said delegates, then present, did, on the 1st day of March, 1784, execute a conveyance to the United States for all the lands to which Virginia had claim north and west of the river Ohio, according to the original terms and conditions proposed by Virginia to Congress for the cession thereof, with the exception only of the guarantee aforesaid, proposed by Congress to be excluded therefrom, and assented to by Virginia, as aforesaid; and whereas the original terms and conditions proposed by Virginia, and assented to by Congress, for the cession by that State of all her lands north and west of the Ohio, impose the following obligations on Congress:

1. That, provided the State of Virginia had not reserved a sufficient quantity of good land on the southeast side of the river Ohio to satisfy the land bounty promised by Virginia to her officers and soldiers who served in the continental line of the Army, and who served in her own State establishment, Congress should make up such deficiency, and of good lands lying between the Scioto and Miami rivers.

2. The aforesaid terms and conditions of cession provide, and it is so expressed in the deed, "that all the lands in the territory hereby ceded to the United States, and not reserved or appropriated for any of the before mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American Army, shall be considered a common fund for the sole use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

Resolved, That the select committee to whom that part of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the public lands was referred, be instructed to inquire and report whether the conveyance of the lands above referred to, by Virginia, to the United States, is not a conveyance in trust for the specific objects expressly enumerated in the deed of cession.

2. Whether those objects have been satisfied, and especially whether Congress, out of the ceded territory, has made provision for the deficit of good lands on the southeast side of the Ohio river, and to satisfy the land promised by the State of Virginia to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on Continental establishment; if not, ought to be promptly made for that purpose.

3. What quantity of the ceded territory has been, or the proceeds thereof, devoted and applied towards the specific objects enumerated in the deed of cession; and what quantity of the said territory has been devoted to uses and purposes not comprehended in the terms and conditions of cession; finally, if it shall appear that there will be a surplus of land in the ceded territory beyond what is required to satisfy the objects and purposes specially enumerated in the original terms and conditions, in pursuance of which the deed of cession was executed, whether Congress is not bound, by the manifest intention of that deed, to provide for a prompt and "bona fide" distribution of the proceeds of the remaining lands, including the value of so much of these lands, if any, as may have been devoted to purposes not warranted by the deed, amongst the States of the Union, according to the ratio of distribution specified in the deed of cession, for the sole use and benefit of the said States; and that the committee have leave to report by bill.

COURTS IN MISSISSIPPI.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, the bill amendatory of the act to reorganize the district courts of the United States in the State of Mississippi, was taken up, read a third time, and passed.

TEXAS BOUNDARY.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then asked the House to go into committee on the bill in relation to the Texas boundary.

Mr. CHAMBERS objected, for if they did not take up private business they might as well reject all claims at once.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a suspension of the rules; but it was disagreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved a suspension of the rules to take up the following resolution, submitted by Mr. THOMAS on Saturday last:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended by adding to the 20th rule the following:

And on the first and third Friday of each month the Calendar of Senate bills shall be called over, and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of.

The House refused to suspend the rules—yeas 84, nays 68; not two thirds.

PAMELA BROWN.

The House proceeded to the private orders, and took up on its passage, the bill for the relief of Pamela Brown, widow of the late General Brown.

The bill was opposed at some length by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, and supported by Messrs. FOSTER, ADAMS, and TAYLOR.

Mr. PETRIKIN having obtained the floor, moved the previous question; which was seconded.

The main question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. GRIFFIN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. DUNCAN moved to lay the bill on the table, and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question upon laying upon the table was then taken, and decided in the negative.

Mr. DUNCAN moved that the House adjourn; decided in the negative.

The question was then taken upon the passage of the bill, and resulted—yeas 109, nays 72.

Mr. DUNCAN then rose and gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, move to reconsider said vote.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, said as it was evidently the intention of the gentleman to defeat the bill, he would move to reconsider the vote now, notwithstanding he would vote against it; and thereupon moved the previous question.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House, and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved that the House adjourn. Not agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to lay the motion for a call of the House upon the table; and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays, but subsequently withdrew it.

The question was then taken upon the motion for a call of the House, and decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 95.

Mr. LOOMIS moved that the House adjourn. Not carried.

The question then recurred upon the previous question, moved by Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana; which was seconded—yeas 81, nays 47.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved that the House adjourn; upon which motion,

Mr. ELMORE demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and were—yeas 43, nays 96.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurring on the motion to reconsider,

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The House then refused to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of May last, in relation to the petition of Elijah Bell, for indemnification of certain losses; which was laid on the table.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of State in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st December last, in relation to the commissioners appointed to survey the north boundary line of the State of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of State, inclosing a report respecting the clerks employed in that Department during the last year; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st ultimo, in relation to a circular issued by the Comptroller in the year 1834 to Samuel Swartwout, having reference to his default; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 5, 1839.

The PRESIDENT announced a communication from the State Department, stating the names and compensation of the clerks employed in that Department during the past year; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of March 13, 1838, in relation to the suits on trial document of the various circuit courts, and district courts having circuit court jurisdiction, &c.; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 31st ultimo, in relation to the correspondence and arrangements between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Bank of North America and Bank of New York; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 20th ultimo, in relation to the public lands through which the Mount Carmel and New Albany railroad passes; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting returns from the incorporated banks in the District of Columbia; which was ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. MOUTON presented a memorial of citizens of New Orleans, praying Congress to grant unappropriated lands to Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of Hugh A. Crawford & Co., praying the reimbursement of a sum of money lost in its transmission through the post office; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of upwards of four hundred citizens of St. Louis, asking for such aid as Congress may think proper, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Louisville to St. Louis; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. LYON presented a petition from a large number of the citizens of Milwaukee, in the Territory of Wisconsin, praying that the preemption claims of Francis La Venture, Ebenezer Childs, and Linus Thomson, to certain lands upon which a portion of that town stands, may be confirmed by Congress.

Mr. PRESTON presented the memorials of Colonel Croghan and Brigadier General Wool, praying for back rations; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LINN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill authorizing the Portage Canal Company to enter at the Government price certain lands at the Wisconsin and Fox river portage, in the Territory of Wisconsin; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. WALKER gave notice that on Monday he should ask leave to introduce a bill to transfer, on certain conditions, the stock held by the Government in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, to the State of Maryland.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred the memorial of Mrs. Mary Thompson, widow of Colonel Alexander Thompson, who was killed in action with the Seminoles in Florida, made an adverse report thereon; which, after some remarks from Messrs. MORRIS, HUBBARD, and NORVELL, was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. M. also, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Dr. Joseph C. Cornell, a surgeon in the Army, made an adverse report; which was adopted, and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which had been referred the memorial of the widow and other heirs at law of the late Alexander Hamilton, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Sarah Angell and the other heirs-at-law of Benjamin King, deceased, reported the same without amendment; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the House of Representatives to reorganize the district courts of the State of Mississippi, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Hernando, De Soto county, Mississippi, to the town of Commerce, on the Mississippi river, in the same county.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to Asa Fisk, Jr., of Mason county, Missouri, the privilege of surrendering the bounty land to his father for military service in the late war with Great Britain, as unfit for cultivation, and of entering the same quantity on other public land; and also, to inquire into the expediency of providing, by a general law, for all persons in like circumstances to surrender bounty land granted to the soldiers of the late war and found to be unfit for cultivation, and enter the like quantity elsewhere.

On motion of Mr. LINN, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Perry, on the files of the second session of the Twenty-Fourth Congress, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

SEATS FOR REPORTERS.

The Senate took up in its order the report of the Committee on the Contingent Fund, to which had been referred the petition of the reporters of distant papers, asking that accommodations might be provided for them, either within the Chamber or in the galleries of the Senate; the report concluding with a resolution providing that the front seats of the eastern gallery be set apart for reporters.

The report and resolution having been read,

Mr. KING wished to know whether it was the object of the committee who presented the report that the rule heretofore adopted by the Senate should be changed, and that the reporters who were admitted by that rule to seats on the floor of the Senate should also be sent to the gallery. We have already six or seven gentlemen engaged in reporting the proceedings for the newspapers of the District, whether correctly or otherwise he would not say; but he was not disposed so to extend this privilege as to give reporters the whole front of the gallery. This would exclude many honest and respectable citizens, who were desirous of witnessing our proceedings. They might, to be sure, put up a box or two for those letter-writers, as he supposed them to be, who represented things in their own way; but he objected to appropriating so large a space for their accommodation. He hoped the resolution would be suffered to lie on the table.

Mr. KNIGHT explained the grounds on which the committee were induced to make this report; but he spoke in so low a tone that it was impossible for the reporters to hear him.

Mr. NILES moved that the resolution be postponed indefinitely. He was somewhat surprised at a proposition that that body should sanction, and in some manner indorse, the vile slanders that issued daily from these letter-writers, by assigning them seats within the Chamber. Who were those persons who styled themselves reporters? Why, miserable slanderers—hirelings, hanging on to the skirts of literature, earning a miserable subsistence from their vile and dirty misrepresentations of the proceedings here, and many of them writing for both sides. As his term of service was about to expire, he could speak disinterestedly on the subject. Perhaps no member of that body had been more misrepresented and caricatured than himself by those venal and profligate scribblers, who were sent on here to earn a disreputable living by catering for the depraved appetite of the papers they wrote for. Shall we sanction such miserable caricatures of the proceedings of this body as are daily sent abroad by these hirelings, and thus give currency to them? for their vile trash goes out to the world in advance of the reports of the regular reporters! No. Were he not unwilling to do any act that might be supposed to interfere, in the slightest degree, with the freedom of the press, he would move some resolution to prevent their coming within the walls of the body at all. As it was, let them take their seats in the galleries, and write what they pleased, without asking for the sanction of the Senate; for he would not consent, for their accommodation, to exclude the honest and respectable citizens who came here as spectators.

Mr. PRESTON said we had already admitted reporters under a rule of the Senate, but this was a monopoly of the local presses; and he knew no reason why they should have a special right of admission. He was in favor of the adoption of this resolution, and opposed to any monopoly in the matter. He was aware that highly colored, and in many instances vituperative, letters had gone forth from this city, and were published and circulated by the party presses of the country. We may, perhaps, all feel that we have more or less cause of complaint against these letter-writers; and he thought that the conduct of no member of the Senate had been more frequently or greatly misrepresented than his own; yet this was one of the evils of a free, and even licentious press; and he was for bearing the ills inflicted on him personally, for what he deemed a greater public good. We have reporters here for papers of both parties, and among them the reporters for a paper that would be the last to say anything to the disadvantage of the Senator from Connecticut, or give him the least cause of complaint. Since the adoption of the rule by the Senate, he had seen but a single editor of one of the city papers on the floor, and he had yet to learn what right he had to be admitted. He thought that the resolution would do no more than justice to the gentlemen connected with the press of the country, of whom it may be said that it is better to have their favorable report while living, than a good epitaph when dead. He did not imagine that it would require as much room to accommodate them as to exclude, to any great extent, that respectable portion of citizens who do us the honor of superintending, and, to some extent, of supervising, our doings in this Chamber.

Mr. NORVELL observed that he had presented the petition of the reporters, whose accommodation was proposed to be provided for in the report now under consideration. Having done so, he felt bound to say that he viewed the proposition made by the Committee on the Contingent Fund to be proper and correct. If the reporters for distant papers could be placed in positions from which they could take notes of what passed in the Senate, without any great inconvenience to other citizens, he thought that this privilege ought to be extended to them. It would enable them to perform with greater facility and accuracy, their engagements to the newspaper press and the reading public. He should exceedingly regret that because members of the Senate had suffered under the calumnies of some of the letter-writers, perhaps some of these very reporters, they should be excluded from the accommodation within the gallery which they had solicited. Their exclusion from the hall of the Senate rendered it difficult, if not impossible, for them to take notes of our proceedings and debates. Perhaps much of the misrepresentation of which complaint had been so feelingly made, occurred in consequence of this very exclusion. He was not of the opinion that newspaper abuse inflicted any great degree of injury upon any public man. He repeated what he had frequently elsewhere said, that so far as he had been the humble object of attack, these newspaper slanders had done him more good than harm, and, with the Senator from South Carolina, he would, on all occasions, go the whole length not only for the freedom, but for the license—the licentiousness of the press, rather than seem to put the free exercise of its liberty under any restraint. He would interpose no obstacle to the unlimited publication of whatever the letter-writers or reporters might choose to say of us. He would do nothing to prevent them from giving full and fair reports. If we cannot sustain ourselves here, or with our constituents, against their calumnies, we must be unworthy of our seats in this hall. He did hope, for these and other reasons, that the Senate would adopt the report under consideration, and grant the accommodations which had been requested.

Mr. NILES observed that he was much obliged to the honorable Senator from South Carolina for his philanthropic system. He would only say to him, that having no interest in it, his case did not require it. The Senator spoke of the exclusive accommodations allowed to the reporters for the city papers as a monopoly, and therefore, unjust; to which he would reply, that from the very nature of things, it must be a monopoly; they could not extend their accommodations to all the newspapers of the country without excluding spectators altogether. It was necessary to fix on some limit; and it had been decided that, to extend accommodations to the papers of the District was going far enough. The reporters of the city papers gave the earliest and fullest intelligence of the proceedings of the body; but these petitioners were not here for the same object that the regular reporters were sent. They were not sent here to report the proceedings; they were, as he understood, letter-writers, sent here to give such a false coloring to what was said and done in that Hall, as would answer the purposes of their employers. He would not, however, interfere with them any more than would the Senator from South Carolina. He had no right to interfere; but, at the same time, he would not, by providing accommodations for them, have their reports go out under the sanction of the House. What were these persons sent here for? Was it not known that the regular reporters here gave full and faithful reports of their proceedings, and though they were somewhat partial, yet, in this particular, the two political parties were equalized? He could say with the Senator from Michigan, he had no right to complain of any injury done him by newspaper slanders. He had, at all events, acquired no small share of notoriety in consequence of the abuse that had been heaped on him. But the true question was, shall we give our sanction to the perversions and deceptions of a parcel of hireling scribblers, sent abroad to pervert, mislead, and corrupt public sentiment? He did not say that they should do anything to stop them; but he would not do anything that could be construed into sanctioning their vile practices. Mr. N. did not wish to take up the time of the Senate further, and, therefore, concluded by asking for the yeas and nays; which were accordingly ordered.

Mr. STRANGE said he would vote for the indefinite postponement; but for a different reason than the one indicated by the Senator from Connecticut. We are all aware of the extent to which misrepresentation and abuse has attained as regards the public men of our country; but he thought it would be as impossible to stop it as to arrest the current of the Potomac. He acknowledged that the present system of admitting reporters was a monopoly; but it must be a monopoly from the nature of the case. If we extend the privilege, where are we to stop? Must every editor who publishes a paper in this country, amounting to upwards of a thousand, have admittance here, to the exclusion of respectable citizens, who are equally entitled to the privilege with themselves? And if you pass this resolution to admit eight or ten additional reporters, why not eighty or a hundred, as they all have the same right to demand admittance here. He thought that a sufficient number were already admitted here for all necessary purposes; and though they could not arrest misrepresentation and calumny, he was opposed to opening the door any wider.

Mr. KNIGHT said that this memorial was presented to the Senate by several gentlemen, who state that they are reporters of the proceedings of Congress, and pray that they may have some place assigned them in the gallery, or any other convenient place. This memorial (said Mr. K.) was referred to a committee of the Senate. The committee supposed that the object referred to them was, to select a convenient and proper place for these reporters. They have done so; and have reported that the front seat in the east gallery, on the right of the President's chair, is a place suitable for them; and they have also reported the resolution now under consideration, assigning it to their use. The committee do not propose to assign to these reporters the whole of the front seat, as is supposed by some Senators; neither does the resolution direct that the present reporters who are accommodated on the floor of the Senate shall be removed to the gallery. No, sir; they will remain where they are. It permits these petitioners to have a place on a part of the front seat of the gallery, for their use. The committee did not consider these memorialists as slanderers and venal letter-writers, as stated by the Senator from Connecticut, but viewed them in the character of reporters.

It is for the Senate to decide whether we shall be shut up in this room, and transact the business of the nation, or whether we shall let our doings be known to the world through the instrumentality of reporters.

My intention, Mr. President, was only to vindicate the committee; not to follow the wide range taken in this debate, but to consider the resolution before the Senate, and whether these reporters shall have a place assigned to them or not. These memorialists are represented in their memorial as reporters of the proceedings of Congress; they have signed their names to the memorial, and have given the names of the public papers they report for; they are papers at a distance from this place.

It is not presumed that these persons will give long and detailed reports of the debates of Senators, but they will give a synopsis of the transactions of the Senate in a manner as acceptable to the public as the reports of whole speeches; they will give the substance, and save the time of reading column after column of a newspaper to find it. They will, no doubt, report facts as truly as the present reporters. Although they may give only a synopsis, yet it will contain much of the doings of the Senate, and in a mode similar to a New York correspondent of the National Intelligencer. We all see in a small corner of that paper, in a condensed form, much of the information we should get by reading a yard square newspaper; all the principal events are related that occur; and these reports will be similar, and will be diffused sooner than the ordinary reports published here. If these reporters have places assigned them, they will feel their responsibility, and they will not be those vile slanderers and venal letter-writers that gentlemen suppose, nor were they so considered by the committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that he should vote for the motion of the Senator from Connecticut; and he would, with the permission of the Senate, briefly state the reasons which had brought him to this conclusion. For his own part, he could not say that he had any personal feelings in relation to these letter-writers. He bore, with as much philosophic patience as any other gentleman, that portion of infliction with which they had thought proper to visit him; and he could not say that they had abused him more than he had reason to expect. He never was mortified but by one letter, and that had been written, he believed, to a Maine newspaper, in which he was represented to be a venerable old gentleman, apparently between sixty and seventy years of age. This, he acknowledged, had touched him upon a tender point.

If it were proposed to furnish seats to as many reporters for the different newspapers of the United States as could be accommodated in the whole of the front seat of the front gallery, he would vote for the proposition with all his heart. But, he would ask, who was a reporter? A reporter was a person who gave a faithful historical account of the proceedings of the body, with full reports or fair abstracts of the speeches of its different members, from which the public could be made acquainted with the nature of the business transacted. Were the letter-writers reporters in this sense? Would any Senator contend that they were? No; they did not themselves pretend to be so. They gave partial and piquant accounts of such proceedings and debates as struck their own fancy; and having the same party feelings with the members of the body, they represented us in the light which would be most agreeable to the readers of the journals for which they were employed. Whilst the letter-writer of one party was in raptures with the speech of a favorite Senator, and represented it as the very perfection of eloquence and argument, another letter-writer of the opposite party denounced the very same speech as a poor, flimsy, frothy affair, which had been scattered to the winds by the breath of some Ajax Telamon on the other side. Now it was notorious that these were the gentlemen, under the name of reporters, for whom seats were to be provided under the resolution then before the Senate. He thought they were not entitled to any such privilege, nor were their labors worthy of such a sanction by the Senate. He had nothing to say against them. Let them mingle with our respectable fellow-citizens who daily frequent the galleries, and let them write what they thought proper. Personally, he did not regard their censure. In the long run, the people always came to a correct conclusion in regard to the merits of public men, no matter how much they were misrepresented. The case of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] was a striking example of the justice of this remark. The letter-writers had done him no injury, although he had been caricatured to a greater degree than any member of the body. Indeed, he believed that these caricatures, instead of injuring, had elevated him in the public esteem. He thought he could appeal with confidence to all sides of the House, whether Whigs, Conservatives, or Democrats, for the truth of the assertion that the Senator from Connecticut now stood higher, much higher, in the body itself, than he had done two years ago.

Mr. B. had on several former occasions stated that, if the Senate expected to have full and faithful reports of their proceedings and debates, there was but one mode of accomplishing this purpose. They could not expect the editors of the Globe and Intelligencer to employ a sufficient number of skillful and experienced reporters to present to the public everything of importance that was said and done in the body. The patronage of these journals would not justify the expense; and in this respect they differed from the leading journals of London, in which you might read the next morning the whole debate of the preceding evening in both Houses of Parliament. The few reporters employed by the Globe and Intelligencer had done their duty as well and even better than could have been expected; but, if the Senate thought it desirable to communicate to the public a full and accurate account of their debates and proceedings, they must employ and pay a sufficient number of their own reporters and make them responsible to the body itself.

Under all the circumstances, he was in favor of leaving the rule as it now was, at least until the end of the present short session. If these gentlemen who asked for the accommodation were really reporters, he would cheerfully vote for the resolution; but as they were not, he would leave them to take their chance, with other citizens of the United States, in the comfortable galleries of the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON thought that the Senator from Pennsylvania was mistaken as to the purport of the resolution; it conferred the privilege of admission on reporters alone, not on letter-writers; and, therefore, if the resolution was adopted, letter-writers would not be admitted under it. But he was not disposed to join with honorable Senators in the unmitigated condemnation they had dealt out to this class of persons; he was of opinion that these letter-writers presented a more interesting sketch, a more faithful picture of the doings of the Senate, than the mere journal-like records of the official proceedings furnished by our city papers, however correct they might be. If, as the Senator from Pennsylvania seemed to think, he had been dealt with more kindly than the Senator from Connecticut, it was because he was a much more humble individual. As the Senator had related an instance in which his vanity was grievously mortified, he would mention one in which his was as highly excited. He had seen one of these letters, in which the writer asserted there was a strong personal resemblance between the Senator from Connecticut and himself, only that he (Mr. P.) was somewhat more venerable in appearance. Now, this, to a person of his humble pretensions to personal attractions, was highly flattering, and might account for his partiality to this class of persons, and to the aversion with which they are regarded by the Senator from Connecticut. But the Senator was amply compensated for this single unpleasant comparison by the many eulogiums which were passed upon him. Why, sir, was it not said by one of them that the Senator from Connecticut spoke extemporaneously in the sententious and forcible language that Franklin, with all his philosophic research, elaborated in the closet? But (said Mr. P.) gentlemen seem to think that our side have the advantage in the misrepresentations which are sent from this city respecting our proceedings. He thought they were mistaken, and that their favors were pretty equally distributed. It was said that these gentlemen wrote for both sides; for papers of both political parties. Well, then, the same letter-writer, to please his employer, in one paper serves up the gentlemen on that side of the House, while in another paper he is equally unceremonious in his caricatures of gentlemen on this side. Now, here was a striking evidence of the impartiality of these gentlemen. In regard to caricature, though somewhat overcharged and distorted, and calculated to make one laugh, yet to be efficient it was always necessary to preserve a likeness, and he thought that a more vivid picture of the doings of the Senate had been presented to the public in that mode than by any other. For his own part, he thought that the misrepresentations of this class could work injury to no one; and that error may be safely tolerated when reason was left free to combat it.

Mr. NILES observed that the honorable Senator from South Carolina was mistaken in one particular. He was sensible that he should be a gainer by a change of constituency, and it was very probable the Senator also would be. The Senator had a wonderful faculty of moving in a circle, and of being at the extremes of politics. He thought he knew the Senator from South Carolina, and that some of his (Mr. N.'s) constituents, the men of the Hartford convention stamp, could not be better represented than by him, whilst he thought that he himself, with the assistance of a gentleman near him, could get along very well in representing the Nullifiers of South Carolina. He was very sorry that his worthy and excellent friend had let fall some observations which might have the appearance of being ironical. He was sensible, however, that the Senator was sincere, and was serious in all that he said. As to these newspaper scribblers, he disregarded them altogether. He was an old campaigner, and what they wrote never affected him. He never read any of their effusions but one letter; and that was done up in a handsome style, and inclosed to him directed in such a neat handwriting, that, supposing it to be from some fair damsel, he took the trouble to read it.

Mr. PRESTON said he could not acquiesce in the suggestion of the Senator that it might be advantageous to them to change positions—that he (Mr. P.) might be the representative of the members of the Hartford convention, and the Senator from Connecticut might represent the Nullifiers of South Carolina. No, sir, (said Mr. P.) I never could be a fit representative of the old Hartford Convention Federalists; nor would the Senator from Connecticut be an appropriate representative of the bravery and magnanimity of the chivalrous Nullifier. Nor would he change States with the Senator. He would not change South Carolina, wrong as he thought she was at present, for Connecticut, however right he might deem her to be. It was better to be wrong with Cato, than right with anybody else.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone the resolution indefinitely; and it was carried—yeas 20, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, and Swift—17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER then rose and asked the indulgence of the Senate while he made a short statement. A remark had been made in the course of the debate, which, to say the least of it, was calculated to throw upon the Presiding Officer of the Senate the imputation of negligence in the discharge of his duty. He alluded to the remark made by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] in which he expressed his disapprobation of an editor enjoying the privileges of coming into that Chamber "from rights unknown to him," or something to that effect. Presuming that the Senator intended to refer to one of the public printers, who was an editor of a daily paper, (Mr. Blair,) and at all times willing to explain the motives which governed his conduct, however inadequate the Presiding Officer might feel to the perfect discharge of the high and responsible duties devolving on him, he would now, with their indulgence, proceed to state to the Senate the grounds on which this gentleman had been admitted within the Chamber. The Presiding Officer intended that his conduct should be such that neither personal nor political considerations could be imputed to him by his admitting any person on this floor, or to any privilege, great or small, in violation of his duty. If the Senator from South Carolina had thought proper to have honored the Presiding Officer with a knowledge of his disapprobation, it would not have been unknown to him by what rights the editor he referred to entered the Chamber. A proposition was submitted to him in writing, soon after his taking the chair, for his decision whether, by a proper construction, the rule adopted at the close of the last session excluded the printers of the body. The Chair had no hesitation in giving it as his construction of the rule, that the public printers, as officers of the body, were not excluded. They were sworn officers, made so by the votes of the body, and as much entitled to come into the Chamber as the clerks, messengers, doorkeepers, and other officers; subject only to the observance of that decorum which was expected of every one coming within their walls. In fact, the public printers, elected by the body, and sworn to the faithful performance of their duty, had been considered as officers of the body, and admitted as ever such, since the foundation of the Government.

The Presiding Officer had thought it his duty, in consequence of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina to make this explanation, that the Senate might correct him if he had been in error. He would assure the Senator that not the affections of a brother—no partialities, personal or political—should ever induce him to swerve, for an instant, from the strict line of his duty.

Mr. PRESTON said that, with the permission of the Senate, he would say, that in his remark in his allusion to the admission of an editor of one of the city papers, he had not intended the slightest offensive allusion to the Presiding Officer of the Senate. He had taken the occasion of a discussion as to the propriety of admitting reporters on that floor, to say that he did not know by what right a certain editor was admitted. If it was under a general rule of the Senate, as a member of the body he had a right to know what that rule was. He still said that he did not know what right the Public Printer had on that floor, more than the printer of any other paper, as he was not mentioned in the rule of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT said, in reply, that he did not bring this matter to the notice of the Senate to convey the idea that the Senator from South Carolina had any personal object in view, or that he intended to wound the feelings of the Presiding Officer. But the Senator must know that these remarks, whether expressed in kindness or otherwise, involved an imputation of neglect of duty on the part of the Presiding Officer, or those who executed the rules under his direction. The Presiding Officer did not feel so neglectful of his own character as to hear remarks calculated to throw on him the imputation of a neglect of duty, without making a prompt and suitable explanation. As to the correctness of his decision, it was for the Senate to judge. The rule did not say that Senators should be admitted, or that the Secretary, or clerks, or Sergeant-at-Arms, or doorkeepers should be admitted, any more than the Public Printer. These were all admitted as sworn officers of the Senate; and if they were not admitted as such, the rule, of course, excluded them.

PUBLIC DEPOSITS.

The resolution submitted by Mr. RIVES, calling on the President for additional information relative to the transactions between the Government and the Bank of the United States, growing out of the sales of the bonds of said bank, was taken up as the unfinished business; when

Mr. NILES addressed the Senate at great length, with considerable force and ability, in reply to Mr. RIVES's speech of yesterday; after which,

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved that the whole subject be postponed until Tuesday, in order that it might not interfere with the graduation bill, which the Senate was pledged to take up on Monday.

After some objections made by Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, and a reply by Mr. WALKER, the motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, was agreed to, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 5, 1839.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, asked leave to present a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. J. W. Jones, late Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, is not entitled to his mileage and per diem allowance for his attendance at the present session.

Mr. WISE objected; whereupon

Mr. MASON said, as it was a matter of some importance, he would move that the rules be suspended; upon which motion he called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER stated that he had received a communication upon the subject from Mr. Jones, and would prefer that the House should come to some decision on it. He then laid before the House the following letters; which were read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 4, 1839.

SIR: I take this mode of informing you that a resolution will, at the earliest opportunity, be introduced to this House, denying your right to receive any compensation as Delegate to the present session of Congress.

I am, sir, with respect, your obedient servant,
J. R. GIDDINGS.

Hon. GEORGE W. JONES, Washington City.

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., January 5, 1839.

SIR: Considering myself entitled, under the usages of the House and the laws of the United States, to receive my mileage and per diem compensation as the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, I received from the Sergeant-at-Arms, on the 20th ultimo, a check on the Bank of Washington for my mileage and per diem allowance up to that date.

Having received last evening the accompanying communication from a member of the House, Hon. J. R. GIDDINGS, of Ohio, and not feeling willing to retain in my hands the compensation alluded to unless most clearly so entitled, I respectfully return to the House, through you, the original check, to be canceled by the House if in their judgment I am not entitled to it.

I came here under the solemn conviction that I was the rightful Delegate of the people of Wisconsin, to serve them here as such until the 4th of March next. This opinion was strengthened by the advice of able counsel, before and since my arrival here. I entertain the same opinion still, but will submit to the decision of the House in both cases without a murmur.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER, with the permission of the House, made a brief explanation of the course of the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Presiding Officer of the House.

By the Journal of the extra session, at the opening of the present Congress in September, 1887, it appeared that "George Wallace Jones appeared as the Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, was sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and took a seat in the House." No certificates of election of members or Delegates were presented at the time of qualification, and the Speaker could not know under what authority they took their seats. Mr. Jones was sworn, and took a seat.

At the commencement of the present session, Mr. Jones appeared in his seat, claiming to be the rightful sitting Delegate from Wisconsin. When the claim of Mr. Doty was presented, Mr. Jones rose in his place and asserted his right. The House, by its acquiescence, recognized him as the sitting Delegate, and took order in the case, by referring the claim to a seat as the Delegate from Wisconsin to the Committee of Elections. Mr. Jones continued in his seat as the sitting Delegate. He, at various times, as the Journal shows, presented petitions and resolutions, and participated in the business of the House, as the sitting Delegate. This was permitted by the acquiescence of the House, until the right to the seat was decided by the House. Whilst Mr. Jones was thus the sitting Delegate, in his seat, in discharge of his duties as such, the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Presiding Officer had no right or power to inquire whether he was rightfully there. That was a question which the House alone could decide. The law regulating the pay of members and Delegates, for aught that appeared of record, entitled him to his compensation until the time he was ousted by a vote of the House. He called for his compensation, and neither the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Speaker had any discretion to refuse it under the law. The check for his compensation was made out in the usual way, by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and signed under the law. Since taking the chair this morning, a letter from Mr. Jones had been laid on his table. And now the question of compensation, under the resolution before the House, was an open one. The House alone can, by its order, refuse the compensation. Under the law, the Sergeant and Speaker cannot. The Speaker expressed the hope that the House would decide the question, and thus relieve the subject from all doubt and embarrassment.

A long debate then ensued, in which the resolution was advocated by Messrs. MASON of Ohio, and GIDDINGS, and opposed by Messrs. WISE, BOULDIN, THOMAS, POPE, CALHOON of Kentucky, BRONSON, and BIDDLE. The latter, at the conclusion of his remarks, moved the previous question; which was seconded.

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, Mr. GRIFFIN, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS inquired of the Speaker whether, in case the resolution should be rejected, he would consider it as authority to pay Mr. Jones his per diem and mileage.

The SPEAKER said he should so consider it. The question was then put upon the adoption of the resolution, and decided in the negative—yeas 89, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Ailan, Banks, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Chaney, Cheatham, Clowney, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cravy, Cranston, Curtis, Cushman, Darlington, Dawson, Davee, Davies, Dunn, Elmore, Evans, Richard Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Giddings, Goode, Griffin, Hall, Halsted, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Kennedy, Lewis, Loomis, Marvin, Sampson Mason, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Mitchell, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogbe, Owens, Parker, Peck, Petrik, Phelps, Potts, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Rariden, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sheffer, Augustine H. Sheperd, Charles Shepard, Sibley, Stanley, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Toland, Underwood, Vanderveer, Albert S. White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, and Jared W. Williams—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Bouldin, Briggs, Bronson, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cleveland, Coles, Crabb, Crockett, Cushing, Deberry, De Graff, Dromgoole, Edwards, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, James Garland, William Graham, Grantland, Gray, Halsey, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hastings, Hawes, Holsey, Holt, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemple, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Logan, Lyoz, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McClure, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Parmenter, Paris, Paynter, Pierce, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Potter, Putnam, Randolph, Robertson, Rumsey, Shields, Shepler, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Thomas, Toney, Towns, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, John White, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Yell, and Yorke—96.

DELEGATES FROM TERRITORIES.

Mr. THOMAS asked leave of the House to present a resolution that the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law relating to the election of Delegates from Territories, so as to define the exact period for which they shall be elected.

Objection being made to its reception at this time,

Mr. THOMAS moved a suspension of the rules to effect that object.

Mr. ATHERTON moved that the House adjourn; which was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken upon suspending the rules, and decided in the negative.

ACCOUNTS OF LEWIS CASS.

Mr. HARLAN asked leave to present a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the final settlement of the accounts of Lewis Cass, late Superintendent of Indian Affairs; of the annual salary of the said Superintendent, and of any extra compensation, commission, or other allowances, over and above his annual salary, which has been credited or allowed to him at the Treasury Department.

Objection being made to its reception at this time,

Mr. HARLAN moved that the rules be suspended to enable him to offer it; and upon that question demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. POTTS moved that the House adjourn; which was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 75.

The question was then taken upon suspending the rules, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 27.

Mr. HAMER moved to amend the resolution by adding the following:

Under what rule or law of the Department such extra allowance was made.

Which being accepted by the mover as a modification,

Mr. McKAY moved further to amend by adding the words:

Together with any opinion which may have been given by the Attorney General in regard to said claim.

Mr. McK. was of opinion that Mr. Wirt, then Attorney General, had given his opinion in relation to the commission. It was nothing but fair that the whole matter appertaining to this subject should be presented to the House.

Mr. HARLAN was understood to oppose the amendment, inasmuch as his object was merely to get a simple statement of the facts first.

Mr. WISE said the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio embraced all that was necessary, including the opinion of the Attorney General.

The question was taken upon the adoption of the amendment, and agreed to—yeas 77, noes not counted.

The question was then taken upon the resolution as amended, and agreed to without a division.

LANDS TO NEW STATES.

Mr. MILLER asked leave of the House to offer a resolution instructing the select committee on public lands, to distribute a portion of the pub-lands to the new States for the purposes of internal improvement.

Objections being made,
Mr. MILLER moved for a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MITCHELL moved that the House adjourn; and, upon that motion,

Mr. MILLER demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Pending the motion,

The SPEAKER asked permission to present a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, furnishing copies of returns made to that Department by certain banks in the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 7, 1889.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in conformity to a resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, in relation to the modes of keeping and disbursing public moneys in foreign countries.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, it was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT also presented a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 2d instant, in relation to the present situation of the Memphis road; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE presented a communication from the Secretary of War, relative to additional clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. W. also presented another communication from the Secretary of War, relative to the disbursing agents of that Department for the bureau of Indian Affairs; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. W. also presented a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, asking for an appropriation to prevent the spread of the smallpox among the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles, and the tribes of the Upper Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the petition of Stephen F. Heminway, asking for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of Samuel R. Slaymaker, praying compensation for carrying the mail in 1835-36; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of John Grigsby; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill granting to the State of Indiana a quantity of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in the State of Illinois; which was read and ordered to a second reading, and five hundred extra copies of the report accompanying the bill ordered to be printed.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Patents, to which had been referred the petition and papers of Chauncey Hall, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the same committee, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill for extending the patent of Thomas Blanchard; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PAMELA BROWN.

The bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Pamela Brown, was read twice and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WALKER, in pursuance of notice given,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, BY BLAIR & RIVES.

25TH CONGRESS, 3d Session.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1839.

VOL. 7...No. 7.

asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize the transfer, on certain conditions, to the State of Maryland, of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.

Mr. W., on asking leave, said that on the 9th of April last, the Senate, upon his motion, had adopted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the dividends received, and present market value of the stock held by the United States in various canal companies. To this call the Secretary of the Treasury had responded in a statement, showing that the Government had never received any dividend from its stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, that this stock is much below par, and that it is doubtful whether it can be converted into money at any price. Mr. W. said, as this stock was yielding nothing to the Government, and could not be sold for money, he was willing to transfer it for a reasonable equivalent to the State of Maryland. This equivalent was, that the State of Maryland should cause, within a specified period, this canal to be completed to the Ohio river, and that, when completed, the canal, throughout its entire distance, should be forever free for the transportation of any property, troops, or seamen of the United States, without the payment of any toll or charge whatever. This bill, then, involved the exercise of no doubtful or disputed constitutional power, but simply provided for the sale for a reasonable equivalent of this stock to the State of Maryland.

The bill was read twice and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. ALLEN presented the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire and to report to the Senate whether the Banks of the District have, in all things, conformed to the conditions of the act entitled "An act to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia," approved May 31, 1838, and especially whether they, or either of them, have evaded, or attempted to evade, the conditions of said act, by using, in any manner, the notes or bills of other banks, corporations, or companies, of a denomination less than that which they are allowed to use of their own notes.

Mr. NORVELL offered the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting one hundred thousand acres of land to the State of Michigan, the proceeds of which shall be applied to the construction of a canal around the falls of St. Marie, to connect the navigation of lake Huron with lake Superior.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Sarah Angell, and other heirs-at-law of Benjamin King, deceased, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty with the Choctaws, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the support of the Penitentiary of the District of Columbia was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of James H. Clark was taken up, and after being discussed for some time, was laid upon the table, for the purpose of taking up the special order of the day.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands came up as the special order, the question being on the amendment offered by the Committee on the Public Lands, under the instructions of the Senate when the recommendation was ordered.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, offered an amendment to the amendment, proposing to extend the privilege of purchasing at the reduced prices to contiguous landholders.

A debate then ensued, in which Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, CLAY of Kentucky, WALKER, SMITH of Indiana, and ROANE, took part; and, without taking any question,

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 7, 1839.

As soon as the Journal had been read, Mr. SLADE wished to know if it would not be in order for him to call up for consideration a memorial presented by him on a former day, relating to the recognition of Hayti.

The SPEAKER decided that it would not.

Mr. SLADE, intimating that he was desirous to address the House on the subject of the memorial, moved that it be taken up for consideration, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. CRAIG was opposed to the motion. He wished to know whether it was of more importance to hear a speech from the gentleman from Vermont, or to proceed in the regular order for presenting petitions?

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the States for petitions; whereupon petitions were presented by Messrs. EVANS, ANDERSON, DAVEE, PARRIS, and ROBINSON, of Maine.

[Mr. DAVEE presented the petition of E. S. Greely, of Dover, in the county of Piscataquis, in the State of Maine, who states that he was appointed by the county commissioners of the county of Penobscot, by authority of law, to take the census of Madawaska, a portion of the disputed boundary between this country and Great Britain; that he attempted to perform that service, and in doing so was imprisoned by the British authorities for a great length of time; that he suffered greatly in health and pecuniary resources, and therefore now prays Congress to allow him such compensation as they may deem proper. The petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.]

Mr. DOWNING, of Florida.

Mr. CRARY, of Michigan, presented a petition for a mail route from Orion to Romeo.

Mr. YELL, of Arkansas.

Messrs. MILLER and HARRISON, of Missouri.

[Mr. MILLER presented the petition of William Sanders, of Green county, Missouri, asking the passage of a law granting him the right of preemption to certain lands therein mentioned.]

Mr. HARRISON presented the petition of John Moore, for compensation for services rendered during the Black Hawk war; of Jeremiah Clay, praying the confirmation of a private claim; of Henrietta De Kersaint, of St. Louis, praying a remission of duties; of Richard Brannin, for compensation for horses lost during the Black Hawk war.]

Messrs. MAY and CASEY, of Illinois.

Mr. CASEY presented the petition of sundry citizens of Edgar county, Illinois, praying the right of preemption to a certain section of the public land in said county, for the use and benefit of the Paris Seminary; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.]

Messrs. CRABR and CHAPMAN, of Alabama.

[Mr. CHAPMAN presented the memorial of Eliza Howard, praying arrearages of pension due her late husband, George W. Howard; which, on motion, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.]

Messrs. RARIDEN, DUNN, EWING, and GRAHAM, of Indiana.

[Mr. GRAHAM presented the petition of James Smallwood, of Clark county, Indiana, praying to be placed on the pension roll, or such other relief as Congress may, in their wisdom, grant; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Also, the petition of George Summers, of Clark county, Indiana, a soldier of the revolutionary army, praying to be placed on the pension roll; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.]

On motion of Mr. G., the claims of Mudy W. Shields, William Thomas, John Gibson, James W. Anderson, William J. Owens, John M. Paurds, Alfred Huckelberry, James Cooper, William Garner, Basil Powel, Thomas Kelly, James Hays, William Patrick, Daniel O. Beem, and Hannibal Durham, for horses lost in the service of the United States, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RARIDEN presented a petition for a post route from Cambridge city, Indiana, via Hagers-town, Franklin, and Rogersville, to Muncy town, in Delaware county.

Mr. DUNN presented the petition of George W. Hopkins, jr., and sixty other men, citizens of Decatur county, Indiana, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; the petition of George W. Hopkins, jr., and seventy-seven other men of Decatur county, Indiana, praying—1. That the traffic in slaves among the States may be abolished. 2. That no new slave State may be admitted. 3. Protesting against the admission of Texas. Also, three petitions of Horace Pease and five other men and six women, of Salt creek, in Decatur and Franklin counties, Indiana, on the same subjects.]

Mr. DOTY, Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, presented the petitions of owners and masters of vessels, for an appropriation for a harbor at Southport; of the inhabitants of Racine, for an appropriation for a harbor at Racine; of inhabitants of Oswego, New York, for an appropriation for a harbor at Racine; of merchants and citizens of Buffalo, New York, for an appropriation for a harbor at Racine; of the inhabitants of Toledo, Ohio, for an appropriation for a harbor at Racine; of the inhabitants of Rochester, Wisconsin Territory, for an appropriation for a harbor at Racine; of the inhabitants of Milwaukee and its vicinity, for an appropriation for a harbor at Milwaukee; of the inhabitants of Milwaukee, praying that Milwaukee may be made a port of entry; of the inhabitants of Wisconsin, for the improvement of the navigation of the Pекатоника river, in Wisconsin; of the inhabitants of Wisconsin, that a post route may be established from Springfield, Wisconsin Territory, by Eagle Prairie and Fort Atkinson, to Madison; of the people of the Brotherton nation, that their lands may be equally divided among them by Government, and that they may be declared citizens of the United States; of the inhabitants of the Wisconsin lead mine district, for a redress of grievances.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented a memorial of Duncan N. Hennan, clerk of the United States district and circuit court for the eastern district of Louisiana, exhibiting charges against P. K. Lawrence, United States district judge of Louisiana, of negligence, corruption, intemperance, &c.

Mr. J. said, as it was a subject of much importance to the judge, as well as to the State, he would move to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. THOMAS said he did not conceive that he would perform his duty by permitting this memorial to take such a course. He considered the Committee on the Judiciary a proper tribunal for the decision of such matters, and that prompt action would be had thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON said, with the assurance that the memorial would be promptly acted upon, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. POPE said it had been unusual to refer such charges of a specific nature to a standing committee. He was in favor of a select committee.

Mr. JOHNSON then renewed his motion for a select committee; which was agreed to, the number of members to consist of seven.

Messrs. GOODE, COFFIN, HARPER, GIDDINGS, CORWIN, MORRIS, RIDGWAY, SIEPLOR, ALLEN, and SWEARINGEN, of Ohio.

[Mr. COFFIN presented the petition of Elizabeth P. Heaton and one hundred and ninety-nine others, women of Columbiana county, Ohio, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; of Jacob Heaton and one hundred and fifty-six others, citizens of Columbiana county, Ohio, praying for the total and immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; which were laid on the table; of John Might, praying an increase of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. HARPER presented the petition of sundry citizens of Muskingum, Coshocton, and Knox counties, Ohio, praying for a mail route from Zanesville, via Belmeaz Cross Roads, Frayeysburg, West Carlisle, and East Union, to Gambia, Knox county. Also, the petition of Davy Pratt, of the District of Columbia, praying an increase of pension.

Mr. RIDGWAY presented the petition of Frederick Reinhart, a citizen of the kingdom of Bavaria, praying for a grant of land from the Congress of the United States, as a recognition of his services in the allied army during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SWEARINGEN presented the petition of Elizabeth Wilson and one hundred and fifty-four other women, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; a petition of Elizabeth Wilson and one hundred and six other women, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to this Union; a petition of Andrew Saltzman and eighty-nine others, citizens of Jefferson county, praying Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade within the District of Columbia, and so to regulate commerce among the several States as to prohibit the traffic in slaves between the States. Also, of one hundred citizens of Jefferson county, remonstrating against the admission of any new States into this Union, whose constitution tolerates domestic slavery.]

Messrs. STONE, CARTER, WILLIAMS, and SPEAKER, of Tennessee.

[Mr. STONE presented the petition of William Brown, assignee of John Dwiggings, praying compensation for lands lost, which had been purchased by the Tennessee Land Company; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. Also, the petition of John McCoullhan, praying compensation for spoiliations done his property by the Cherokees, after having been settled peaceably among them under the authority of Governor McMinn; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.]

Messrs. CHAMBERS, SOUTHGATE, MURRAY, and MENEFFEE, of Kentucky.

Messrs. JACKSON and TOWNS, of Georgia. Messrs. CAMPBELL, THOMPSON, and LEGARE, of South Carolina.

Messrs. GRAHAM and McKAY, of North Carolina.

Messrs. WISE, BOULDIN, MASON, GARLAND, COLES, BANKS, JOHNSON, CRAIG, TALIAFERRO, and BEIRNE, of Virginia.

Mr. WISE said he was about to present a petition of rather a unique character. It had been forwarded to him, and was addressed to the House of Representatives. It came from one woman and one man. He could not say whether or not they were joined together. "Their names were J. S. White and Louisa Grosvenor, of Calais, in the State of Maine. There was a seal upon the paper also of a singular character. Stamped upon the wax was the representation of a sheaf of wheat, sitting on an end in a wheat field. The inscription thereon was "you deserve a thrashing." Mr. W. then went on to say that he could not tell whether it was himself or others who were designated as deserving "the thrashing." Be that as it might, the prayer of the petition was that the House would rescind its standing resolution by which all abolition papers are laid upon the table.

Mr. W. then moved, in substance, that the petition be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to report a resolution rescinding the "Atherton resolutions;" and more especially that portion of them by which abolition papers are laid upon the table on presentation; that the memorials already received by the House and laid on the table, be taken from the files of the House and returned to the petitioners, and that in future all abolition memorials, of whatever character, be not received by this House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to lay the whole subject on the table; but,

Mr. WISE intimating a desire to address the House on the subject, the motion to lay on the table was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER decided, however, that, a debate arising, the resolution would lie over one day under the rules. It lies over accordingly.

Messrs. WORTHINGTON, THOMAS, and KENNEDY, of Maryland.

Messrs. KLINGENSMITH, McKENNAN, PLUMER, NAYLOR, PETRIKIN, DAVIS, TOLAND, BEATTY, and BIDDLE, of Pennsylvania.

[Mr. PLUMER presented a petition for an appropriation to improve the Alleghany river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. Also, a petition for the establishment of a steam revenue cutter; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PETRIKIN presented the petition of Jacob Boston, praying for a pension for wounds received in the service of the United States, at the blockade of Tripoli.]

Mr. HALSTEAD, of New Jersey.

Messrs. LOOMIS, GALLUP, MITCHELL, NOBLE, MARVIN, RUSSELL, McCLELLAN, CAMBRELENG, ANDERSON, VANDERVEER, FOSTER, PRATT, KEMBLE, TAYLOR, CURTIS, CLARK, BRODHEAD, MOORE, PUTNAM, HOFFMAN, PECK, SIBLEY, and FILLMORE, of New York.

[Mr. PRATT presented petitions from the citizens of Catskill in the county of Green, New York, for the improvement of the mouth of the Catskill creek; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed. Also, a petition for a mail route from Sherborn to Oneonta, through Davenport to Sanford, in Delaware county, New York; also, one from Potter's Hollow, in Albany county, to Broom, (through the center of that town,) in Schoharie county.

Mr. GALLUP presented the petition of Mrs. Nancy G. Van Rensselaer, widow of the late Colonel Henry R. Van Rensselaer, of the New York line of the revolutionary army, praying for a pension.

Mr. McCLELLAN presented the petition of Charles Rohler, of the city of New York, asking remuneration for services performed in the pilotage of Government vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Also, the petition of Charles Darling and others, of Hudson, New York, praying an appropriation for the benefit of the harbor at North Black River Lake, in Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Also, the petition of Abigail Allen, of Hudson, New York, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER presented a petition from Joanna Smith, praying for a pension; from Gorham A. Worth, praying to be discharged from a bond signed by him as surety for Samuel Edmond; and from Lettis Pond, praying for a pension.

Mr. CURTIS presented a memorial from two hundred and five citizens and voters of the city of New York, praying for a repeal of four resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives on the 12th of December last, on motion of Mr. ATHERTON, of New Hampshire, in respect to memorials and petitions relating to slavery. Mr. C. said he was personally acquainted with many of the persons whose names appear on this memorial. They were of the most intelligent, substantial, and worthy citizens of New York. Among them he recognized the name of William Cullen Bryant, a gentleman whose fame as an author, and whose learning and ability as a political writer, are familiar to the House and the country. Mr. Bryant, as editor of one of the leading journals of the country, (the New York Evening Post,) occupies a position of much power and influence over the public mind.

Mr. C. was here called to order by Mr. MORGAN; but upon the declaration of Mr. C. that he would not occupy the time of the House further than to state the contents of the petition, which he had a right to do under the rule, the Speaker said Mr. C. was in order; and he proceeded to say, that the petitioners denounced the resolutions of the 12th of December as false in principle, anti-republican in their character, utterly subversive of all that is precious in the sacred right of petition, alarming as a precedent, especially to be reprobated for the unfounded imputation which the resolutions cast upon the signers of abolition memorials, in ascribing to them a design to "overthrow an institution of the several States," and, above all, (said Mr. C.) these memorialists complain of the resolutions because they were passed under the spur of the previous question, without time for consideration, discussion, or debate. Mr. C. moved the reference of the petition of Mr. Bryant and others to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. C. also presented a memorial of William A. Whitehead and Captain Hunter, in relation to Indian Key, in Florida, proposed to be made a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Also, the petition of Sarah Bagley, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Also, the petition of William Colgate & Co., and others, praying for the imposition of a duty on starch imported into the United States, sufficient to counteract the duty now levied upon imported wheat; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures. Also, the petition of William Austin and others, for a law providing for the continuance of pensions heretofore granted to persons wounded on board of private armed vessels during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Also, the memorial of Joseph L. Smith and others, citizens of Frederick and Carroll counties, of Maryland, praying for the recognition of the independence of Hayti, and the establishment of the customary political and commercial relations between the United States and Hayti; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Also, the memorial of John Chambers and others, citizens of Virginia and Maryland, praying for the recognition of the Republic of Hayti as an independent nation, and for the establishment of political and commercial relations with that Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented the petition of Peter W. Short, of New York, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.]

Messrs. HALL, ALLAN, FLETCHER, and EVERETT, of Vermont.

[Mr. ALLAN presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, for the grant of a tract of land for each of the colleges in that State; which were referred to the select committee raised on the subject of the public lands; petition of seventy-five citizens of Johnson, Vermont, for the recognition of the Republic of Hayti; petition of seventy-four males and sixty-four females, inhabitants of Johnson, Vermont, against the admission of any new State into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery, and against the annexation of Texas to the Union; petitions of fifty-eight males and fifty-eight females, inhabitants of Johnson, Vermont, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territory of Florida, and to prohibit the traffic in slavery between the States.

Mr. FLETCHER presented the petition of Mary Peck; which was referred, with the vouchers, to the Committee of Claims. Also, the resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Vermont, asking for a grant of land to the several colleges within the State.]

Mr. HEROD presented the petition of Thomas Bronaugh, praying for a pension on account of injuries received while in the service of the United States during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Messrs. TOUCEY, INGHAM, HALEY, HALL, WHITTLESEY, and HOLT, of Connecticut.

[Mr. INGHAM presented the following petitions: Petition of Elizabeth Pratt, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions; petition of children of Daniel Starr, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions; petition of inhabitants of Guilford, Connecticut, asking an appropriation for a light-house; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce; petition of inhabitants of Wolcott, Connecticut, for a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; petition of Colonel Robert D. Wainright, of the marine corps, asking an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; petitions of officers and students of the Wesleyan University in Middletown, Connecticut, asking Congress to act as mediator between France and Mexico, and also to take measures for the establishment of a national code and board of arbitration for the adjustment of national disputes; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; petition of Lydia Wentworth, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions; petition of inhabitants of New Haven, Connecticut, praying for an appropriation to improve the harbor at that place, and also that the work for the improvement of the entrance of Connecticut river may be speedily matured; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce; petition of citizens of Hartford, Connecticut, asking Congress to adopt measures to procure a congress of nations, to establish a code of international law and board of arbitration for the adjustment of national difficulties; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; petition of one hundred and fifty-four persons, men and women, of Saybrook, Connecticut, against the admission of Texas, or any new State whose constitution tolerates slavery; also a petition of one hundred and forty-two persons, citizens of the same place, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; also of one hundred and eighteen persons, men and women, of Middletown, Connecticut, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States; also of one hundred and forty-four persons, men and women, of the same place, against the annexation of Texas, or the admission of Florida, or any other new State into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery; and of one hundred and eleven persons, of the same place, praying Congress to rescind the resolution of the 12th of December; all of which were laid on the table.

Mr. HOLT presented the petition of John Parker, of Connecticut, praying Congress to place his name on the pension roll. Also, the petition of the inhabitants of Columbia, Tolland county, Connecticut, asking Congress to make a grant of land to the heirs of those who participated in the military services and sufferings at Wyoming.]

Messrs. CRANSTON and TILLINGHAST, of Rhode Island.

Messrs. FLETCHER, BRIGGS, CUSHING, GREENELL, REED, LINCOLN, PARMENTER, CALHOUN, ADAMS, and SALTONSTALL, of Massachusetts.

[Mr. PARMENTER presented the petition of Louisa S. Wetherbee and sixty-three others, women of Roxborough, Massachusetts; of Sarah Brigham and two hundred and three others, women of Walham, Massachusetts; of Ruth Bowker and seventy-two others, women of Sudbury, Massachusetts; of Sally Woods and forty-nine others, women of Dunstable, Massachusetts, all praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and of the slave trade between the States. Also, the petition of Joseph W. Cross and forty-six others, of Boxborough, Massachusetts, for the rejection of all proposals for the admission of any new State whose constitution may tolerate slavery; of Joseph W. Cross and forty-five others, of Boxborough, Massachusetts, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.]

Mr. CUSHING presented the memorial of Peter Sanborn and others, of Reading, in the State of Massachusetts, praying the House to rescind the resolution of the 12th of December last; and moved that said memorial, together with the resolves of the State of Massachusetts, on the right of petition and debate, presented to the House on the 28th of May last, and not finally acted on by the House, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, with instructions to consider the expediency of adopting the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the several States composing the United States of America are not associated on the principle of unlimited submission to the Federal Government, or to the Houses of Congress, or either of them; but that, by the Constitution, the people of the States constituted one general Government for special purposes, and delegated to that Government certain definite powers only, reserving each State to itself the residuary mass of right to their own self-government; that while the Constitution and laws of the United States do attach to the whole people of the several States immediately in those matters within the true jurisdiction and confines of said Constitution, and in the modes limited and defined thereby, yet in all other matters the said States retain each its own political sovereignty; that to this Constitution each State acceded as a State, and is an integral party, and in its capacity of a sovereign State is represented in Congress by its Senators duly appointed; that among the residuary rights so by each State reserved, is that of freely and fully expressing its opinions on all subjects of public concernment to the States or the people thereof; and of communicating the said opinions to Congress; and that it is the constitutional duty of the Senate and of the House of Representatives respectfully to receive, entertain, and consider, and maturely and deliberately to decide upon all such communications addressed to it by either of the States of this Union; and the summary rejection of the same, without their being debated, printed, or referred, or any action whatever had thereon, is insulting to the honor and injurious to the rights and interest of the said sovereign States of the Union.

Resolved, That the Federal Government is a Government of limited and specific powers, derived from the people of the States thereby confederated and united, and to said Government by them granted under the Constitution; that all powers not delegated to the said United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people; that, therefore, no right of any denomination can be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified, by the Congress, by the Senate, or the House of Representatives, acting in any capacity, by the President, or any department or officer of the United States, except in the instances wherein power is given by the Constitution for those purposes; and that among other inalienable and essential rights, the freedom of conscience, of speech, and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, are of the original and innate immunities of the said people of the United States; rights of theirs not derived from, or to be weakened by, the common or any other positive law of this or any other country, but inherent in the said people as people, and under the constitutions of the several States by and to the said people guaranteed and consecrated forever; and which, by reason thereof, cannot be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified, constitutionally, by any authority of the United States whatsoever, nor in any form of law, whether the same be the act of the two Houses of Congress, or of either of them separately.

Resolved, That the people of the United States did ordain and establish the Constitution thereof in order, amongst other things, to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity; that, to this end, the powers of legislation were vested in representative and deliberative assemblies, to wit, a Senate appointed by the States, and a House of Representatives chosen by the people of the States; that, in the exercise of their rights by the said House of Representatives and the members thereof, there should be full scope and perfect equality, without interdiction of any subject of public concernment, and without inhibition of any subject to members from one portion of the Union, or exclusive privilege of it to those from another portion; that all such attempts to smother and suppress the discussion of particular subjects, whilst illusory and fruitless in themselves, do moreover impeach the first principles of Democratic liberty, which enjoin the establishment and propagation of political truth without let or fear; that the freedom of speech, forbidden by the Constitution to be abridged in whatever case, is more supremely entitled to immunity and respect in the person of the Representatives of the people in Congress, who, for all orderly speech or debate in either House, should not be questioned nor hindered there nor elsewhere; that the House of Representatives may determine the rules of its proceedings, but that it cannot, constitutionally, by a perpetual antecedent prohibition, preclude its members, or any one or more of them, from debate and motion as to a specific excepted class of subjects, provided the same be things within the purview of the Constitution, and concerning which the people of the United States, or any part thereof, desire to be heard through their Representatives in Congress.

Resolved, therefore, That all that part of a certain resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 12th day of December last, which provides that "every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper," of a prescribed class, "shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid on the table, without being debated, printed, or referred," is a violation of the rights of the States, whose official communication, of said class, is excluded from due and proper consideration; a violation of the right of petition inherent in the people of the United States, which it cancels and abridges; and a violation of the privilege of speech and of debate, rightfully appertaining to the members of this House, which it forecloses and abolishes; and, therefore, that so much of said resolution be, and the same is hereby, declared to be unconstitutional, and merely void, and of null effect.

Mr. C. having indicated a wish to debate this resolution, it lies over for one day under the rules.

Mr. ADAMS presented a memorial from sundry inhabitants of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, asking Congress to remove the present seat of Government from the District of Columbia to some point North, where the principles of the "Declaration of Independence" are not treated as a "mere rhetorical flourish." After alluding to a memorial presented at the last session, from inhabitants of the District, in favor of the retrocession of the same to the States of Virginia and Maryland, but on which there had been no action, Mr. A. observed that the memorial now presented would furnish an opportunity of considering so serious and important a subject. He wished the House to consider it as a proposition for a compromise. After some further remarks which, owing to the noise, were inaudible, he moved its reference to a select-committee, with instructions to consider the same, and report on the constitutional power of Congress to recede the District to the States from which it was taken. And on that motion he demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved to lay the whole subject on the table; on which motion the yeas and nays being ordered, were—yeas 108, nays 53.

So it was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS presented another memorial of a humorous character, asking the appointment of a "committee on color," to whom should be referred all officeholders and members of Congress, for the examination of their respective pedigrees, said committee to report on the same, and in all cases where the parties shall be found to have the least drop of colored blood in their veins, they shall be expelled from office, and their places filled by persons of pure Anglo Saxon blood.

Mr. A. was about to make some remarks on the subject, when

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose to ask if the memorial had been received, as, if not, he would raise the question of reception. He considered the memorial as an evident ridicule of the House.

The SPEAKER stating that it had not as yet been received—

Mr. DROMGOOLE raised the question of reception.

Mr. ADAMS denied that the memorial was in the least disrespectful to the House, and demanded the yeas and nays on the question of reception; which, being ordered, were—yeas 24, nays 117.

So the House refused to receive.

Mr. ADAMS inquired, as the House had refused to receive, whether the motion to refer would be entered on the Journal?

The SPEAKER replied that it would not, the memorial being in the possession of the member.

Mr. ADAMS said, if it was in order, he would move the printing of the memorial, that the House might see what it was they had refused to receive.

The SPEAKER said that such a motion was not in order.

Mr. ADAMS then made a request that it be entered upon the Journal that he had made the motion to print.

The SPEAKER decided the motion to be out of order.

Mr. ADAMS presented a memorial from the State of Maine, asking the House to rescind the resolution of December 12; also, in favor of the recognition of Hayti. Mr. A. moved a reference of the latter portion of the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report a resolution in favor thereof.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to lay that motion on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS then moved a reference of the former portion of the memorial; which,

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, was also laid on the table.]

Mr. LINCOLN, of Massachusetts.

Messrs. FARRINGTON, CUSHMAN, WILLIAMS, and ATHERTON, of New Hampshire.

[Mr. CUSHMAN presented the petition of Samuel E. Coues and one hundred and thirty-nine others, citizens of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, praying for the establishment of a high court of nations, to adjudge and determine upon all international difficulties which may be brought before said court by two or more nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Also, the petition of Samuel Kincaide, praying for an increase of pension for disabilities incurred during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.]

Mr. MERCER, (who was not in his seat when petitions were called from his State,) on leave, presented the petition of Joseph Harris, of Alexandria.

Mr. DOTY, of Wisconsin, on leave, presented several petitions; when,

On motion of Mr. YORKE, the House adjourned.

Mr. TOUCEY has been appointed a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. FAIRFIELD as a member of the House of Representatives.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1839.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 11th of May last, in relation to the value of imports, and the amount of duties thereon, from 10th May, 1837, to 10th May, 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th ultimo, inquiring whether certain exiles of Poland have complied with the terms upon which certain lands were granted to them in Rock River county, Illinois, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also a communication from the Secretary of War, in conformity to a resolution of the Senate of the 2d instant, in relation to the time when the claims of volunteers of Alabama, for horses lost in the campaign against the Seminoles, will be investigated; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SWIFT presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, in favor of a more thorough organization of the militia of the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, presented the petition of John Miller, praying that a mistake in relation to a land entry may be rectified; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of Mary Slow; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented a memorial from citizens of Benton county, Alabama, praying for the passage of bill No. 135 for the relief of those persons who were deprived of the benefit of the preemption law of 19th June, 1834, and whose preemptions were taken by the Indians; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of upwards of one hundred citizens of Stark county, Ohio, on the subject of the neutrality bill of last session, and the manner in which it was executed; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. PRENTISS presented a resolution of the Legislature of Vermont, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their efforts to procure the grant of a tract of land for each of the colleges in that State.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of Susan Trigg; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. C. presented the petition of Mira Alexander, praying for compensation on account of revolutionary services; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of officers of the Army, praying that their compensation may be equalized with the officers of the staff; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. YOUNG said he was requested to present the petition of a number of gentlemen of the legal profession, in the State of Illinois, for an amendment of the acts of Congress establishing the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Illinois, so as to require terms of the said courts to be held at the city of Chicago, in addition to those directed to be held at the seat of government under the existing laws. The petition was signed by the chief justice and two of the three associate justices of the supreme court, by two of the circuit judges, the member elect to Congress from the southern district, and several of the most distinguished attorneys, including the district attorney in the State; and, in his judgment, was entitled to consideration and respect. The northern congressional district in Illinois, in which Chicago is situated, contained, at this moment, more population than the other two districts together, and the business in the courts in that part of the country had increased in a still greater proportion. He trusted, therefore, that the subject might receive the favorable consideration of this and the other House of Congress; and, with that view, he now proposed its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to; and the petition referred accordingly.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of Lieutenant Ketchum, commissary of subsistence, praying for relief; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of Edward C. Jones, praying compensation for the transportation of troops; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. K. also presented the memorial of Joshua Kennedy, of Mobile, praying compensation for a mill which was destroyed by the Seminole Indians, while in the occupancy of the troops of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. K. also presented the memorial of citizens of Benton county, Alabama, asking that they may be permitted to enter lands in lieu of others taken up by Indian reservations.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, the petition of Andrew Bean, presented at the last session, and remaining on file, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the petition of John Burd, presented a bill for his relief, accompanied by a report, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the bill from the House of Representatives to amend an act to recognize the district courts of the United States in the State of Mississippi, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of Josephine Nourse, reported a bill for her relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. T. also, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of James H. Ralston, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading; and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. T. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of E. W. and H. Smith; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the same committee, to which had been referred the claim of John Prichett, for remuneration for the loss of a vessel, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was adopted.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the claim of John Ireland and the heirs of John G. Mackall, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Royal Hopkins, for property destroyed during the last war in Canada, prayed to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the claim of John Robbarts, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the claim of Joseph W. Paige, for information furnished during the last war of infraction of the embargo laws, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of David Stone; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, directors of an association called the New England and Mississippi Land Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the same committee, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill fixing the salaries of certain district judges of the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Colonel George Croghan; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

BRANCH MINTS.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the bill supplementary to an act to establish branch mints was taken up, and after a few remarks from Mr. BUCHANAN, was, at his suggestion, laid over for the present.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were taken up for consideration, read the third time, and passed:

The bill to renew the patent of Thomas Blanchard;

The bill making appropriations for the support of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia; and

The bill further to regulate the transmission of the mail upon railroads.

COURT IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia," was taken up; and, at the suggestion of Mr. KING, its further consideration was postponed for a few days.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands came up as the special order, the question being on the amendment of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, proposing to extend the privilege of purchasing at the reduced prices to contiguous landholders, to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, under the instructions of the Senate when the recommendation was ordered.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the amendment and the bill generally; and was followed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, YOUNG, and CLAY of Kentucky.

Mr. MERRICK intimated his intention of addressing the Senate on the subject to-morrow.

After a brief executive session, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1839.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, asked leave of the House to offer a resolution, in substance that the House in future should meet at the hour of eleven o'clock instead of twelve as heretofore.

Objection being made to the reception of the resolution at this time,

Mr. WILLIAMS moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer it, and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the suspension of the rules, and decided in the negative.

Mr. EVERETT asked the consent of the House that the resolution upon the subject of the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, submitted several days ago, should be taken up.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked to the gentleman that, after the reports of the committees had been made, that resolution would come up in order. He hoped the reports of committees would, therefore, be first received.

Mr. EVERETT then waived his motion for the present.

Mr. HUNTER, of Virginia, asked leave of the House to present and have printed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill which shall provide:

First. That all money hereafter to be received by the United States for customs, shall be paid on four certain days fixed, at intervals for three months, the duties required by the existing laws to be paid in cash, to be secured by bonds with approved security, bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum from its date until paid, and payable at the next fixed quarterly day, unless it bears date within twenty days of that period, in which case it is to be payable on the next succeeding day fixed for payments to the United States. But if the importer be entitled to credit under the existing laws, the sum due is to be diminished by a discount at the rate of six per centum for the time through which the said credit extends, and the sum thus ascertained to be secured by bond as aforesaid, under the limitations above prescribed.

Secondly. That all debts due from the United States shall be made payable, so far as practicable, on four certain days, occurring at intervals of three months, and fixed at twenty days respectively after the days fixed as aforesaid for payment to the United States. These debts, in all cases when practicable, to be made payable at the next day of disbursement, unless incurred within twenty days of that time; in which case to be payable at the second succeeding day fixed for that purpose. But if the public creditor should fail to present his claim at the place at which it is payable when due, or within — days of that time, then the United States to be absolved from all responsibility for any failure in the disbursing agent at that place to pay the said creditor: Provided, however, That the said agent and his sureties shall be liable, in their individual capacity, to pay to the said creditor any sums received for his use, upon demand, and without interest.

Thirdly. That all requisitions on the Treasury Department by other Departments of this Government for sums to be disbursed at the next day fixed for that purpose, shall be made at least twenty days before the day fixed for public receipts, and next succeeding that of the requisition.

Fourthly. That the Secretary of the Treasury, after a comparison of the liabilities to and from the Government, at the next succeeding days of receipt and disbursement, shall ascertain the probable surplus which will be due to the United States upon the next quarterly day of receipt, after collecting what will be sufficient to discharge the debts due from the Government at the next disbursing day, together with whatever sum may be needful as a cash surplus for emergencies of the Department not otherwise provided for. The debtors of the United States to be entitled to an extended credit upon the surplus thus ascertained, upon their giving bonds, with approved sureties, bearing interest as aforesaid, up to the quarterly day of the receipts next succeeding that at which the original bond was due. Each public debtor offering security as aforesaid, to be entitled to this further credit upon an equal proportion of his debt; which proportion is to be specified by public advertisement of the Secretary of the Treasury, at least twenty days before the next succeeding day of receipt. But all bonds given for the surplus as aforesaid, to be wholly collected at the next quarter when due, before any portion is demanded of their bonds given, when the debt for duties was increased.

The resolution was then laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839; which on his motion was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a bill to amend the act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes to meet the current expenses of the Government, approved 21st May, 1838; committed, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. C., the Committee of Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of a certain communication from the Department of State, in relation to the extra services of the attorney of the northern district of New York.

Mr. HAYNES, from the same committee, reported a bill for the support of the Military Academy of the United States for the year 1839; which was committed and ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the estimates for new barracks for the cadets, and barracks for a company of dragoons, and stable for their horses, at West Point, and that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. POPE, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. PICKENS inquired if this bill had been reported from a majority of the committee?

Mr. POPE was understood to say that two were in favor and two against. He did not know how the others were. Mr. P. moved its commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PICKENS moved that it be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. POPE was understood to say that a majority of a quorum of the committee had authorized him to report the bill for the reconsideration of the House.

Mr. PICKENS stated that the object he had in view in moving the recommitment was to call the attention of the House to the dangerous system now coming into practice, of reporting bills to the House with the understanding that they had received the sanction of a majority of the committee, when such was not the case. It was obvious that such a system was calculated to lead to unsound legislation, as it was well known that the House was greatly influenced on any measure by the fact of a majority of a standing committee having recommended it. It was not this bill in particular to which he objected, but the principle, which applied to all other cases of the same nature.

Mr. DROMGOOLE made some observation against the practice of reporting bills to the House, when the majority of committees were against them. He hoped the bill would be recommitted.

Mr. EWING was surprised at the course of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] in attempting to affect the important measures of the country by informal action. It had been stated that the bill had been reported by the direction of a majority of a quorum of the committee; and what could he wish more? If the gentleman had anything to say against the committee, why did he not arraign them, and not impede the progress of measures of such importance to the country? He would have the gentleman to know that at this session the will of the people, and not that of the Executive, would rule the action of the House. At all events, if he did not learn the lesson at the present session, he would soon learn it.

Mr. PICKENS repelled the charge of having any prejudice against the committee, with much warmth. He wished it to be understood that it was with reference to the principle alone which had induced him to move a recommitment of the bill. He alluded to several bills of deep interest reported at the last session, but which had not received the sanction of a majority of the committees from which they came, and argued that the House had undoubtedly acted under the impression that the case was otherwise. As for what the gentleman from Indiana had said about the people ruling, he did not understand what he meant. He (Mr. P.) had always been of opinion that it was the people who ruled. He had learned that long ago. The present measure was neither an Executive measure nor the people's measure; it was a measure in which all were interested. Mr. P. repeated that his objection was not so much against the present bill as against the principle of reporting bills to the House with the understanding that a majority were in their favor, when such was not the case. He hoped that gentlemen, in deciding this question, would consider it as testing a question calculated to produce unsound legislation.

Mr. SIBLEY opposed the motion to recommit; as the gentleman from South Carolina had referred to bills reported at the last session, he would ask him to consider the history of those bills. He would then find, that although a majority of the committee declared themselves adverse to them, yet they passed the House by a large vote, and also the other branch of Congress. He argued at some length against the policy of making no reports in favor of measures, without the concurrence of a majority, as when the propositions came before the House, independent action could be had thereon, without any reference to what had been done by the committee.

After some remarks from Mr. MERCER, which were inaudible,

Mr. PICKENS said what he wished to say was, that upon all great matters reported to the House, it ought to be announced whether or not the report was concurred in by the majority of the committee. By such a course the House would be in no danger of receiving a false impression. But he must protest against the system of receiving bills as having received the sanction of a majority, when the fact was otherwise.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the gentleman from South Carolina was partly right and partly wrong. The fact was that it frequently happened that members of the committee were opposed to the objects for which the appropriations were intended, although they reported in favor of such appropriations, because they were required by law so to do. He added the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy as an instance. Some of the committee were opposed to the institution, although they considered themselves bound by law to report the appropriation. But on other occasions it became the duty of the committee to take into consideration the state of the finances, before they made the appropriations. Mr. C. explained that recently three members had been absent from the committee, two of whom were sick, but that the committee had been bound by the rules of the House to report the four large bills within thirty days from the commencement of the session. The bills reported that morning had been reported by the majority of a quorum, but not until after the appropriations had been cut down to the smallest amount.

Mr. FILLMORE opposed the motion to recommit. As there was no law for the House to fill the committee after the manner of a jury, it was bound to take the word of a member when he said that a bill had been reported from the majority of a quorum.

Mr. POPE said it was contrary to the usual course of legislation to require the names of each member of a committee who might vote on any report. If that was required, it would then be necessary for every committee to have a clerk and keep a journal. He went on to state that when he was directed to report the bill, there were five members of the committee present, and the majority of a quorum were in favor of the report.

After some remarks from Mr. CRAIG in opposition to the resolution,

Mr. PICKENS said he had moved the instructions under the impression that there were only three members of the committee who had agreed to the report; but as the gentleman from Kentucky had stated otherwise, he would withdraw the instructions, and simply move to recommit the bill.

The question was then taken on that motion; and it was rejected.

The question then recurring on the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the heirs of John Broome, and the petition of Eliza McKay; which was laid on the table.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Anne Temple Green; and that so much of said memorial as relates to the heirs of Captain Nicholson, prior to the adoption of our present Constitution, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and so much of said memorial as relates to the services of said Captain Nicholson since the adoption of the present Constitution, be referred to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred Senate bill entitled "An act to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes," reported the same back to the House without amendment.

Mr. LOOMIS, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Morris Wright and Captain Samuel Dodge; which were severally laid upon the table.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the same committee, to which had been referred Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of John Braham, late receiver of the public moneys at Huntsville, Alabama," reported the same back without amendment.

On motion of Mr. WORD, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Robert Scagg; and it was laid upon the table.

Mr. MURRAY, from the same committee, reported unfavorably on the petitions of Thomas C. Cope and John T. Austin; which were laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. MURRAY, said committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James Butler and others.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the children of Apollon Cooper, deceased; which was committed.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of George P. Allen; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill making appropriations for the payment of the services of a company of volunteers mustered into the service of the United States by Captain Drain; which was committed.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, stated that that committee, at the last session, reported a number of bills of great public interest, which failed to receive the action of this House. The committee have made a selection from bills of the last session, those which they conceive of the greatest importance, and have directed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 10th instant, from and after one o'clock, be specially assigned for the consideration, in preference to any other business, of House bills—

No. 703. A bill for extending and improving the navy-yard at Brooklyn, and for constructing a dry dock at the same.

No. 572. A bill to alter and regulate the Navy ration.

No. 573. A bill to regulate the pay and emoluments of pursers of the Navy.

No. 570. A bill to authorize the purchase of two vessels to be employed as receiving vessels in the naval service.

No. 571. A bill for reducing, under one head of appropriations, various appropriations for building, rebuilding, purchasing, and repairing vessels of war, and for providing materials for the same.

No. 525. A bill for the payment of certain pensions heretofore paid out of the privateer pension fund.

And if all of said bills shall not be finally disposed of on said day, then, and in that case, the next succeeding day, at the hour aforesaid, shall be in like manner assigned for the further consideration of the same.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend by striking out the bill providing for the dry-dock at Brooklyn.

Mr. INGHAM hoped the proposition to amend this resolution would not succeed.

The question was taken on striking out, and decided in the negative.

Mr. WISE asked the House to amend the resolution by adding the bill for the augmentation of the United States marine corps.

Mr. INGHAM said this was one of the bills that the committee would have included, if they thought it would meet the approbation of the House.

After a few words from Mr. CRAIG, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL moved to strike out that part of the resolution which appropriated any other day beside Thursday. The resolution, as adopted, would encroach upon private bill day, to which he was opposed.

After a few further remarks from Mr. INGHAM in support of the resolution, the question was taken on the proposed amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. TOLAND then moved to amend the resolution by adding the bill providing for the construction of a dry-dock at Philadelphia.

Mr. SMITH said there was another subject of much importance which he wished would receive the attention of the House; and therefore he would move to amend the resolution by adding the "bill providing for the erection of certain hospitals upon the western waters."

Mr. WISE. That is not a naval bill. It was never before our committee.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. ELMORE, by consent, offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House statements of the value of the exports and imports of each State and Territory for the years 1837 and 1838, showing what amount of the exports was of foreign and what of domestic growth and manufacture; the amount of duties accruing each year on such imports, and the amount actually collected; what amount was duty free, and what amount was chargeable with duty; and also what amount of drawbacks was paid into each State.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report further to this House what articles under the present tariff of duties are duty free, and what are chargeable with duties; also, what is the specific and ad valorem duty paid on each article now, and what will be the amount of duty under each reduction provided for by law.

The resolution, under the rules, lies over for one day.

CONVENTION WITH TEXAS.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked the consent of the House, before proceeding to the orders of the day, to go into the Committee of the Whole upon the bill entitled "An act to provide for carrying into effect the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Texas, and for marking the boundary between that Republic and the United States."

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, said this was a subject of considerable interest to his State, and hoped the House would agree to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the suggestion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and took up the above bill; and, there being no proposition to amend the same, it was reported to the House, and received its third reading, and was passed.

DEFALCATION OF SWARTWOUT.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution of Mr. CAMBRELENG, to refer the message of the President in relation to the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, except so much as relates to the modification of the revenue laws, to a select committee.

Mr. WISE withdrew his former motion, leaving, as an amendment, the resolution of Mr. GARLAND for the appointment of a select committee of nine, to be chosen by ballot.

Mr. CAMBRELENG accepted the resolution as a modification, except the words "by ballot."

Mr. GARLAND moved to insert the words "by ballot."

A long debate then arose, in which Messrs. WISE, CAMBRELENG, CUSHING, GARLAND, PICKENS, BOON, and others, participated, and which will be given hereafter.

Without taking any question,

On motion of Mr. BOON, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 9, 1839.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the President of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 21st of December last, containing information relative to the several Departments, called for by said resolution; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the President of the United States, inclosing a report from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, calling for information in regard to the examination of inventions designed to prevent the calamities resulting from the explosion of steam boilers, directed by the acts of June 28 and July 9 last; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the number and compensation of clerks in his Department during the year 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. TIPTON presented the memorial of Edward Tippet, asking for an investigation into the merits of an improved steam boiler; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RIVES presented the memorial of W. S. Naylor, administrator of the estate of William Sanford; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. R. also presented the memorial of the clerks in the Fourth Auditor's Office, for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented a memorial of officers of the line of the Army, praying that their pay may be equalized with that of the officers of the staff; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RESOLUTIONS OF VERMONT.

Mr. PRENTISS presented certain resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Vermont, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their efforts to prevent the passage of any law for the annexation of Texas to the Union, and to procure the passage of a law for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the Union, and of the slave trade between the several States; and also protesting against certain resolutions [Mr. ATHERTON's] adopted by the House of Representatives, as unconstitutional; which Mr. P. moved should be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

The question was, on motion of Mr. FOSTER, divided, and the first division was agreed to.

The question coming up on the second division, viz: to print the resolution,

Mr. PRENTISS said he had made the motion to print these resolutions because he supposed it would be an act of proper courtesy to the Legislature from whom they come. When he presented them he had not the slightest idea that any serious objection would be made to them, or that they would excite any debate, and he would say to gentlemen of the South, that the course which they were pursuing was precisely the course to increase the number and augment the strength of the Abolitionists; and he thought it in other respects impolitic and injurious, as well as wrong and unreasonable in itself.

The virtual rejection of petitions here was regarded as an infraction of the right of petition, and this was connected with the great subject of abolition, and had given to it a power not properly its own, so that those who were opposed to extreme and premature measures, and who wished to prevent useless excitement and agitation, found themselves powerless in consequence of this connection; and if this course were persisted in, they would be obliged to give way entirely. Mr. P. trusted these resolutions would be printed as an act of common courtesy, and he called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN confessed that he was amazed when he saw a gentleman of the calmness and correct judgment of the Senator from Vermont, pursuing the course that he did. That there should be any man of any intelligence whatever who did not see that this question strikes at the very foundation of the Union, alienating one portion of it from the other, and that it tended to the overthrow of the best hopes of mankind, indeed surprised him. Nor was it less wonderful to him that any gentleman of that description should pretend to say that the best course of southern gentlemen was to permit the Abolitionists to come here and urge the question whenever they pleased. They tell us (said Mr. C.) that we have no right to our own estates; that a large part of our property is held without law; and that they have the right to come here week after week, year after year, questioning our right to it, and calumniating our character, while the best mode for us to pursue is to be quiet. Sir, (said Mr. C.), I would not have made these observations, if the remarks that called them forth had not come from a respectable quarter. The course of the gentleman from Vermont was a striking proof that on all questions of deep excitement the strongest minds may be carried away. Mr. C. would say to the Senator from Vermont that this thing must be arrested at home, by strong measures, or the South would take care of itself.

Mr. PRENTISS said he had simply asked that these resolutions might be printed, as a mark of the courtesy usually evinced to States of this Union. He did not enter into any argument on the question of abolition. Neither he nor any other Senator from the North had, on any occasion, been found to agitate that question. The fault, if it was one, lay in another quarter. He wished merely to discharge an obvious duty. If he found it certain that he could not carry out his own opinions on the subject of slavery, which he trusted were well known, he thought it best to defer the attempt to a more favorable opportunity. These resolutions were passed by the Legislature of Vermont in consequence of petitions requiring their passage. They were resolutions of instruction, and, so far as he was concerned, he wished to discharge the duty imposed upon him.

Mr. KING found no fault with the Senator from Vermont for discharging his duty to his State, in presenting such resolutions as they thought proper to charge him with. He waived, therefore, under these considerations, any objections to receiving the resolutions. They came from a sovereign State; but whether that State was true to the principles which should govern every member of the Confederacy, was another question. With regard to the prayer of these resolutions, every man of common intelligence knew that, if it were granted, this Union would not last twenty-four hours. He knew that he, and every man from that section of the Union which would be so grossly outraged by such a measure, would instantly on the adoption of it retire from their seats. He would, in such an event, return to his constituents, and tell them that the compact was broken, the Constitution violated, and their property taken away from them, and that he, as their representative, could render them no further service by remaining where he was: Believing that such would be the inevitable consequences of carrying out the doctrines contained in these resolutions, he could not consent to give them any circulation. What was the object of the Senator from Vermont, in wishing to have these resolutions printed? The Senator himself declared that he did not expect any such thing as action on those resolutions; and yet he wished to have them printed. For what? To give encouragement to these people to send out more memorials to act on their Legislature, inducing them to interfere with matters which do not belong to them. If that was the object of the gentleman—and he trusted and believed that it was not—he might have some reason for urging the printing of these papers; but, as he had a great respect for the gentleman, and believed that he had no such object in view, he was at a loss to conceive why he persisted in the motion. He thanked the gentleman for warning the South of what became their duty under the present state of excitement on this subject. Sir, (said Mr. K.), we will discharge our duty to ourselves and our constituents, without asking advice from the Senator from Vermont or from his Legislature, or the Legislature of any other State. He had hoped that they would have been spared, in this body, the agitation of this exciting subject. He knew that it had taken place elsewhere in a manner highly disgraceful, but he had confidently expected that this body would escape it, and that the Senator from Vermont would be the last man to bring it up. He regretted the necessity of making these few observations, but he was compelled to do so, because he thought the Senator from Vermont was forcing this matter beyond what was necessary.

Mr. LUMPKIN said his object in rising was to move that the motion to print be laid upon the table. But before he submitted that motion, he would remark that he fully concurred in the remarks of the Senators from South Carolina and Alabama, [Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. KING,] and that he felt no disposition to countenance or respect attempts to agitate the question of slavery, the more because it was brought before the Senate by the proceedings of a sovereign State. No, sir, (said Mr. L.), the agitation of this question by obscure and ignorant individuals is harmless and innocent when compared with the proceedings of the Legislature of Vermont. Yet the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PRENTISS] admonishes the South to keep cool and quiet, to disregard the efforts of those who are constantly warring against their rights and interests. Sir, (said Mr. L.), this advice reminds me of a robber, who, while he has his hand in my pocket, taking from me that to which he has no just claim, ceases not to admonish me to be quiet—be easy—he will do me no harm. Every lover of this Union should cease to agitate this question. The interference of the Abolitionists and their supporters with the domestic concerns of the South is daily becoming more offensive. These proceedings are rapidly alienating the affections of one portion of the Union from the other. We should circulate nothing from this Senate calculated to increase excitement and prejudice. Under this view of the subject, I move to lay the motion to print on the table.

The question was then taken on Mr. LUMPKIN's motion to lay the motion to print on the table, and carried—yeas 29, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merriek, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Tipton, White, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, and Swift—8.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John Elliott, on the files of the last session, be taken therefrom and again referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the memorial and papers of Henry H. Pickering, on the files of the last session, be again referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which had been referred the bill giving assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. R., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill concerning the estates of idiots or lunatics and infants, in the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. R. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill extending the jurisdiction of the corporation of the city of Washington over the Potomac bridge, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to explain and amend the fifth section of the act passed June 30, 1834, for the better organization of the marine corps of the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

GENERAL HERNANDEZ.

Mr. BENTON said, that at the last session the Committee on Claims presented an adverse report in the case of General Hernandez. He had now in his hand additional evidence, which established, on oath, the occupancy of the property by the troops of the United States, which he wished should be referred, in addition to the papers already on file, to the Committee on Claims.

On this motion a long debate ensued, in which the merits of this claim, and other similar claims, was discussed; which resulted in a motion, by Mr. BAYARD, to rescind a former order of the Senate postponing the consideration of these claims until the passage of a general law on the subject; which was adopted, when,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, it was Ordered, That the petitions and papers relating to the claims of Gad Humphreys, John J. Bulow, and others, be again referred to the Committee on Claims.

CONVENTION WITH TEXAS.

The bill from the House of Representatives to provide for carrying into effect the convention between Texas and the United States, and marking the boundary, coming up for consideration,

Mr. BUCHANAN said that it was necessary to pass this bill as early as possible. The season when operations should commence was near at hand, as the surveyors should be on the line by the 1st of March next. The bill is an exact transcript of the bill which was framed for carrying into effect the convention respecting the boundary line between this country and Mexico—Texas now standing in the place of Mexico. The bill had been shown to the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who had unanimously approved of it, and acquiesced in the necessity of its immediate passage. It had, therefore, in fact, been referred to the committee and reported on, and he hoped it would be put upon its passage at once.

The bill was then read twice, and by unanimous consent, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and passed.

MAILS UPON RAILROADS.

An act further to regulate the transmission of the United States mail upon railroads, was read the third time and passed.

• PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the special order, which was the bill to provide for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, to the amendment which the Committee on Public Lands reported under instructions, to allow persons already settled on, and cultivating farms, to purchase contiguous tracts at the reduced price.

After a debate, in which Messrs. MERRICK, FULTON, and WALKER took part,

Mr. NILES moved to modify the amendment so as to restrict the right of entry to persons who "own, reside upon, and cultivate" adjoining lands, instead of "who own" adjoining lands.

This modification being agreed to,

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merriek, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Swift, Wall, Williams of Maine, and Wright—22.

Mr. BUCHANAN, after a few remarks, offered an amendment to limit the operations of the bill more strictly to actual settlers, by providing that patents shall not be issued for entries made under it until two years thereafter, when proof shall be made of the actual settlement, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; in default of which the entry shall be void, and the land revert to the United States.

This amendment was agreed to—yeas 21, noes not counted.

Mr. BUCHANAN then offered a second amendment, to limit the quantity to be entered under the provisions of this bill, by each actual settler, to three hundred and twenty acres; which amendment was also agreed to.

Mr. B. offered another amendment, to limit the operations under this bill for five years after its passage and no longer, except for the purpose of granting patents to those who have made their entries, but have not had an opportunity of making their proof.

This amendment was also agreed to—yeas 25; noes not counted.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, then offered two amendments in lieu of the whole bill; the first of which authorizes the purchase, by actual settlers, of such of the public lands as have been in the market for fifteen years, at the following rates and in the following quantities, namely: eighty acres at fifty cents per acre; one hundred and sixty acres at seventy-five cents per acre; and three hundred and twenty acres at one dollar per acre. And the second amendment introduces the bill formerly brought in by Mr. C. and passed in 1832, and vetoed by President Jackson, to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. BENTON said that he wished to mark this as the first step towards the reestablishment of the old tariff, and he wished to draw the attention of Senators to it. This distribution was intended to commence in 1840, when the revenue would be reduced to its lowest point; and the amount thus distributed will have to be raised by reviving the old tariff.

The amendment was then ordered to be printed, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 9, 1839.

Mr. EVANS asked that certain communications on the Speaker's table be presented to the House; to which objection was made.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports; whereupon,

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John Sibbrook; which was read twice and committed.

Also, a bill for the relief of Matthew Wiley; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Frances Jones, the widow of John Jones, of the State of Virginia; which was committed.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Susannah Hoagland; which was committed.

Mr. CHILDS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William A. Cudderback; which was committed.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Allen Wardwell; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FRY, from the same committee, reported bills of the following titles; which were severally read and committed:

A bill granting a pension to Helen Miller;

A bill granting a pension to William Andrews;

A bill granting a pension to Houston Cornell; and

A bill granting a pension to Stephen Olney.

On motion of Mr. FRY, the Committee on Revolutionary pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of David Corson, Mary Page, Frederick Wilheid, and Martha Green; the latter of which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. STANLEY, from the Committee on Invalid

Pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petitions of Hugh McDonald and Captain James Duncan; which was laid on the table.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the benefit of E. Stafford; which was committed.

Also, a bill for the relief of Wright Hulbert; which was committed.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of James McLaughlin, William White, James Allen, Jacob Crudeck, Stephen Morill, Richard Reynolds, Isaac W. Taylor, Rufus Parker, and B. H. Shethorus; which were laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Harvey Reynolds.

Also, a bill for the relief of Dr. Sylvestus Nash.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Stephen Appleby; which were severally read twice and committed.

Mr. McCLELLAN, of New York, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of James Singleton; which was laid on the table.

Mr. McC. also, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were severally read and committed:

A bill granting a pension to John Clark;
A bill granting a pension to William Swann;
A bill granting a pension to Gilbert Sprague Fish; and A bill granting a pension to David Rollins.

Mr. HEROD, from the same committee, reported a bill granting arrears of pension to Josiah Westlake.

Also, a bill granting arrears of pension to Ann Ross, widow of Lieutenant Ross; which bills were read twice and committed.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, the Committee on Roads and Canals were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of certain citizens of Appalachicola, Florida, and the same was committed to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. DARLINGTON, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report upon the petition of William Stouts; which was laid on the table.

Mr. GRAY, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report upon the petition of James L. McKennie.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Mariah L. Kenshaw; which was laid on the table.

Mr. STUART, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of William W. Scott; which was laid on the table.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Henry Grady; also, a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John T. Adams; which bills were read, and laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill to extend the privileges of drawback, and abolish distinctions in ports of entry.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for its third reading,

Mr. GRENNELENG wished to ask if a bill of so much importance ought not to be discussed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to the gentleman from New Hampshire the propriety of postponing its further consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. CUSHMAN, with a view of affording time for the examination of the bill, consented to its postponement until to-morrow.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill authorizing the canceling of certain debenture bonds; which was committed.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Nicholas Phelan, heir-at-law of John Phelan, deceased; which was committed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the papers in the case of the heirs of Carlos de Villemont, who claim a tract of land at Point

Chicot, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of confirming the sale.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of T. F. Peterson; which was laid on the table.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Solicitor of the Treasury, submitting documents in the case of Gamaliel E. Smith, referred to that office by resolution of the House of Representatives of 7th July, 1838.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of 31st December, showing the progress made, sum expended, and the amount yet applicable to the object, and the causes which have retarded the completion of Fort Livingston, at Gra d Terre, Louisiana; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st December, giving information of the amount due of the late deposit banks at the time of the suspension of specie payments, with the sums now due, and how received; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with an act of Congress, inclosing a statement showing the names of clerks employed in the Treasury Department in the year 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 31st December last, showing the cause why that officer could not ascertain the defalcation of the late collector of New York; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ADAMS presented to the House certain papers and lithographs in relation to the Smithsonian bequest; which were, on his motion, referred to the select committee on that subject, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS IN INDIAN WARS.

Mr. POPE asked leave of the House to submit a motion.

Objection was made.

Mr. POPE moved to suspend the rules of the House, to enable him to move the House to have the bill (No. 369) to extend the provisions of the pension act to the officers, soldiers, rangers, and spies, engaged in the Indian wars on the western waters prior to the treaty of Greenville, in the year 1795, made the special order of the day for Tuesday, the 19th instant.

Mr. P. remarked that this subject had been before Congress for several years, and he feared that it would not be reached, or acted on, during the present session, unless the House would consent to fix some day for its special consideration. The class of men for which this bill intended to provide, were as brave and meritorious, and had as high claims on the liberality of this Government, as any other to which the public attention had been called.

Mr. P. earnestly pressed the House to afford an opportunity to have the merits of these claimants, who had contributed so much to conquer the western world from the Indian tribes, fully and fairly discussed and decided.

DEFALCATION OF SWARTWOUT.

The House then resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, referring the President's message in relation to the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, except so much as relates to a modification of the revenue laws, to a select committee.

Mr. WISE had modified his amendment by accepting as a modification the following amendment, offered by Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, some time ago:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, to consist of nine members, to be chosen by ballot, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the causes and extent of the late defalcations of the custom-house at New York and other places, the length of time they have existed, the correctness of the returns which have been made by the collector and naval and other officers, and the deposit banks, respectively; and all such acts connected with such defalcations as may be deemed material to develop their true character.

And be it further resolved, That said committee be required to inquire into and make report of any defalcations among the collectors, receivers, and disbursers of the public money, which may now exist; who are the defaulters, the amount of defalcation, the length of time they have existed, and the causes which led to them; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had accepted this amendment as a modification of his motion, except the words "by ballot," and modified it accordingly.

Mr. GARLAND had then moved to amend the motion as modified by inserting, after the words "to be appointed," the words "by ballot."

After some remarks from Messrs. BOND and TAYLOR,

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved the previous question; but, on being reminded that it would have the effect of cutting off the amendment, at the suggestion of several members, he withdrew it.

Mr. THOMAS then took the floor; and, at the conclusion of his remarks, moved further to amend the resolution by striking out "by ballot," and inserting "viva voce."

Messrs. MENEFFEE and ROBERTSON continued the debate until a late hour; when

Mr. LEGARE having obtained the floor, moved an adjournment.

Mr. MAY demanded the yeas and nays; but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, renewed the motion for the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them—yeas 28, nays 161.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 10, 1839.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th ult., relating to the number of superficial acres in the States of Alabama and Mississippi, embraced in the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of the Mississippi City Company, requesting a grant of public land to aid them in the construction of a railroad from Paulding to Mississippi City; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS presented the petition of a number of citizens of Brown county, Ohio, praying the repeal of all laws of Congress in any way favoring slavery or the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

The motion of reception was, after some remarks by Mr. MORRIS,

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, laid on the table.

Mr. ROANE presented the memorial of officers of the line of the army, praying equalization of compensation with officers of the staff; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LYON presented the memorial of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying confirmation of title to land upon which the town of Milwaukee stands; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING presented a communication from the Governor of the State of Alabama, inclosing resolutions of the Legislature of that State, relative to claims for spoiliations committed on citizens of Alabama by the Creeks in 1836; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of Benjamin F. Hard, asking compensation for losses sustained by a mail contract; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of Daniel Hyatt, for seven years' half pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of James H. Kennedy and Benjamin O. Fallon, for losses sustained by Indians on the Upper Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of Simon Brewster, a soldier of the revolutionary army, for an increase of pension, for reasons therein set forth; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the petition of William E. Chase; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RUGGLES presented a letter from President Morse, in relation to his magnetic telegraph; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the claim of Gad Humphreys for losses in Florida, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading; and, on motion of Mr. H., the accompanying report was ordered to be printed, and the bill made the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of William B. Ferguson and sureties; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. R., from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of Thomas W. Becket, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the petitions of Francis La Venture, Ebenezer Childs, and Linus Thompson, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading; and the accompanying report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Henry Wilson, confirming purchases of certain lands in Arkansas, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred the petition of Samuel Crapin, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Rufus R. Lane and others, citizens of White county, Illinois, in relation to Simon Hail and John Neil, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the memorials of the Taunton Branch Railroad Company, and of Jesse Smith, made an unfavorable report thereon, and asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to, and the reports ordered to be printed.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the bill to grant to the States and incorporated companies engaged in the construction of roads or canals, the right of way through the public lands of the United States, reported the same without amendment.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William Seaton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, a paper from Thomas J. Smith was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HUBBARD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing and improving as many artificial harbors upon Lake Michigan as will render more safe the commerce and navigation of that lake, and afford greater security and protection to human life.

This resolution, after some remarks by Messrs. KING, HUBBARD, CALHOUN, NORVELL, DAVIS, and LYON, was adopted.

On motion by Mr. KING, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to Lieutenant S. B. Thornton, for losses sustained by him by the destruction of the steamboat Pulaski.

On motion of Mr. K. the papers in relation to the above were also referred to the same committee.

Mr. ROBBINS submitted the following resolution; which, after some remarks by Mr. R. and Mr. PRESTON, was agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, consisting of five members of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to consider the expediency of providing an institution of learning, to be established in the city of Washington, for the application of the legacy bequeathed by Mr. James Smithson, of the city of London, to the United States, in trust for that purpose; also, to consider the expediency of a charter for such institution, together with the powers and privileges which, in their opinion, the said charter ought to confer; also, to consider the expediency of ways and means to be provided by Congress other than said legacy, but in addition thereto, and in aid of said benevolent intention; and to report by bill or bills in the premises.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the net proceeds of the public lands which each State would have received up to and including the 1st of January, 1839, under the bill entitled "An act to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting land to certain States," which passed both Houses of Congress, if it had received the approbation of the President.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the existing laws as to equalize the amount of labor to be performed, and the amount of compensation to be received by the several judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolutions; which were considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, required to report to the Senate the whole amount of the expenses incurred by the United States in negotiating and concluding the treaty with the Cherokee Indians, dated 29th December, 1835, to whom the several sums expended were paid, the sum paid to each, and for what particular services.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, required to report to the Senate whether the commission created under the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, dated 29th day of December, 1835, for the adjudication of claims, has been terminated; and if not, by what authority the said commission has been continued since the 23d day of May last; and further, what has been the expense of said commission, to whom the sums expended have been paid, and the sums paid to each individual.

Mr. WHITE said, with the permission of the Senate, he would offer a few remarks on a subject which concerned him personally. When he arrived here some days since, he found that he had been appointed on two of the standing committees of the Senate, but as the state of his health was such as to prevent him from paying that attention to the subjects brought before them which the Senate and his colleagues on the committees had a right to expect, his object in rising was to ask that he might be excused from serving on them.

After some remarks from Mr. KING and Mr. TIPTON, in which the services of Mr. WHITE were appropriately noticed, and wishes expressed that he would change his determination,

Mr. WHITE returned thanks to the gentlemen for their kindness in noticing his efforts; but persevering in his wish, the Senate acceded thereto.

On motion of Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, it was

Resolved, That Hon. JOHN TIPTON be appointed chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that the President of the Senate appoint a member to fill the vacancy in said committee.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, the President of the Senate was also directed to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, occasioned by the resignation of Hon. Hugh L. White.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, and by unanimous consent, the resolution offered by Mr. RIVES, some days since, was taken up and agreed to.

GRADUATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

The question being on the amendment submitted yesterday by Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, to limit the reduction to lands only that have been in the market fifteen years, and to the quantities of eighty, one hundred and sixty, and three hundred and twenty acres, according to the rate of reduction; and further, to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, after 1840, among the several States of the Union,

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, addressed the Senate in favor of his amendment; after which,

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate in opposition to the amendments, and in favor of the bill as at present amended; after which,

The question was taken on Mr. CLAY's amendments, and they were rejected—yeas 13, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, and Tipton—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Fulton, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—29.

Mr. BENTON then submitted the fifty cent clause of Mr. CLAY's amendment—to permit actual settlers to enter lands that have been in the market fifteen years, at fifty cents per acre, the quantity being limited to eighty acres for each actual settler.

The amendment was agreed to—yeas 24, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Foster, Fulton, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams of Mississippi, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Swift, Wall, Williams of Maine, and Wright—19.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the bill was then ordered to be printed as at present amended; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 10, 1839.

The SPEAKER having proceeded to call the committees for reports,

Mr. HUBLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of Peter Moore & Co. and others; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Rozaline Proudhomme; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. G. also, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports upon the petitions of Henry M. Fleury and Alexander L. Deblien; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the Committee on Foreign Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Cowper.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Dennis Trammel; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to David Meilen; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. PLUMER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Levi M. Roberts.

Also, a bill for the relief of Benjamin Wesley; which bills were severally read twice and committed.

PUBLIC DEFAULTERS.

The House then resumed the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the modified resolution of Mr. Wise to print twenty thousand extra copies of documents No. 297 and No. 13, relating to the defalcation of public officers.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. Loomis to amend, by striking out No. 297, and leaving only No. 13, relating to the defalcation of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the port of New York.

Mr. GRAVES moved a call of the House.

On that motion Mr. MENEFFEE demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 88, nays 95.

So the call was not ordered.

The question then being on agreeing with the amendment,

Mr. BRONSON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Belme, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cray, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dring, Doolittle, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Loomis, James M. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—112.

So the amendment was rejected.

The further consideration of the subject was cut off by the expiration of the morning hour.

NAVY-YARD AT BROOKLYN.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the House went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on a bill for extending and improving the navy-yard at Brooklyn, and for constructing a dry-dock at the same.

Mr. PAYNTER moved to amend by adding "$100,000 for the construction of a dry-dock at Philadelphia."

On this amendment a long debate ensued, in which Messrs. PAYNTER, PICKENS, NAYLOR, MALLORY, THOMPSON, CAMBRELENG, REED, PARMENTER, HOFFMAN, SERGEANT, and others participated.

Mr. THOMPSON moved further to amend, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting "$100,000 for the construction of a dry-dock at Pensacola, Florida."

The debate was then continued by Messrs. HOFFMAN, ELMORE, A. H. SHEPPERD, PICKENS, PETRIKIN, THOMPSON, and STANLEY; when

Mr. EVANS, having obtained the floor, moved that the committee rise.

The committee then rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with the tenth section of the deposit act, accompanied by a statement showing the condition of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, which had been selected a depository of the Government; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, the following message, in writing, from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I communicate to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its resolution of the 3d instant, reports from the Secretary of State and War, containing all the information called for by said resolution now in possession of the Executive.

WASHINGTON, January 10, 1839.

[The resolution called for information in relation to an invasion of the southwestern frontier by an armed force from Texas.]

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1839.

Mr. SEVIER, of Arkansas, appeared in his place in the Senate this morning.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication, in compliance with the tenth section of the deposit act of 1836, in relation to the selection of a deposit bank; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a communication from the President of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of yesterday, relative to the agency of the Secretary of War in negotiating the sale of the bonds of the Bank of the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, directing their representation in Congress to use their efforts to effect the establishment of certain post routes; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. L. also presented a joint resolution from the same source, requesting their representation to procure the passage of a law for compensation for horses lost by the volunteers of General Nelson's brigade in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. L. also presented a joint resolution from the same source, requesting their representation to procure the passage of a law for compensating citizens of Georgia for losses occasioned by the illegal destruction of their property by troops of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NORVELL presented a certificate of eleven sailing masters on Lake Erie, as to the facility of access to the harbor of Brest; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of Hazard Knowles; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. DAVIS presented a report made to the topographical bureau in 1834, of a survey of the harbor of Newburyport; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBARD presented certain documents; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEVIER presented two memorials from settlers on public lands in the State of Arkansas; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of the executrix of William D. Cheever, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Daniel Goodwin, reported the same without amendment, with a recommendation that the bill do not pass.

REPORTS ADOPTED.

The report from the Committee on Pensions adverse to the petition of the widow of Colonel Alexander Thompson, was considered and adopted.

The report from the Committee on Claims adverse to the petition of Joseph W. Paige, was considered and adopted.

The joint resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. ROBBINS, relative to the Smithsonian Institution, was considered and adopted.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, the appointment of the committee on the part of the Senate was devolved on the President.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. FOSTER gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Andrew J. Johnson and Samuel Love.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Samuel Ferguson; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. Y. also, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of James Dutton; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CITIZENS OF ARKANSAS.

The bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty between the United States and Choctaw Indians, being taken up for consideration, and Mr. MORRIS having made some objections to its passage,

Mr. FULTON said: The bill under consideration passed the Senate at the last session, and has repeatedly failed for want of time to be acted on in one House of Congress or the other. The justice of the measure is so manifest, that no one who understands it could find, he thought, any sufficient ground for opposition to it. The circumstances under which the citizens who lost their improvements in the country ceded to the Choctaw tribe of Indians ask relief of the United States Government, are these: The Territory of Arkansas, as it was originally organized, extended forty miles west of the present western boundary of the State of Arkansas. During the existence of the territorial government, this strip of country—a portion of it possessing great fertility, and being in a healthful part of the country—belonged exclusively to the United States; but the jurisdiction over it having been surrendered by the creation of the territorial government, was organized into counties, and settled upon by an industrious and enterprising population, who made valuable improvements, and opened up fine settlements in that remote and wild region; so much so that when these forty miles of territory, extending along the whole western border of our State—at that time Territory of Arkansas—were ceded to the Choctaws and Cherokees, some of the most flourishing settlements in the counties included in those limits were broken up. Our citizens were forced to abandon their houses, and to leave behind them valuable tracts of cleared land, fit for cultivation, with comfortable dwellings, good fences, and all the conveniences requisite for farming purposes, and which were given up to the enjoyment of the Indians, who were removing into the country. The Indians who got the benefit of the labor and enterprise of those frontier settlers and meritorious citizens, had surrendered to the United States, in exchange for those improvements, a valuable country in the States east of the Mississippi; and, consequently, the United States received a valuable consideration for those improvements, and are, therefore, justly indebted to those settlers for the losses and sacrifices they were compelled to make in giving up their homes, and removing from the country they had settled in, as a part of the Territory of Arkansas.

Those settlers who lost their improvements by virtue of the Cherokee treaty, were remunerated by a grant of three hundred and twenty acres to each settler, made to them by Congress many years ago. At the time of the ratification of the Cherokee treaty, his colleague (who was then the delegate from the Territory) considered it so great a grievance, that he remonstrated against it in the most decided and spirited manner; and by way of compensating the sufferers, and to induce the inhabitants to abandon their settlements, Congress passed the act granting them three hundred and twenty acres, as he had already mentioned.

The settlers who are sought to be provided for by the present bill, had previously abandoned their improvements, under a treaty made with the Choctaws, for that part of the same strip of forty miles, (then a part of the Territory,) and which, by a treaty made in 1824, was ceded to that tribe of Indians. These sufferers were not provided for by the bill granting lands to the sufferers under the Cherokee treaty; and although their claim was certainly equally just and meritorious, yet owing to the procrastination of legislation in Congress, a bill for their relief has never yet passed both Houses of Congress.

The Committee on Public Lands, at the last, as also at this session, were not willing to report a bill for giving more than a quarter section of land to each of those sufferers; although those who had been previously provided for had received double that quantity. As, however, even this small remuneration is better than a total denial of justice and right, he was willing to accept this grant, rather than submit to a longer delay.

He said that he felt satisfied, taking into view all the circumstances of the case, and considering the previous action of Congress in a similar instance, that no fair objection could be urged to the passage of this bill; and he therefore hoped that the Senate would give the same decided vote in favor of this bill which it had given at the last session of Congress in favor of a similar bill.

COURT IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill for amending an act entitled "An act for establishing a criminal court in the District of Columbia," was informally passed over.

JAMES H. CLARK.

The bill for the relief of James H. Clark was taken up, and after a discussion, in which Messrs. WILLIAMS, of Maine, and SOUTHWARD advocated the passage of the bill, and Messrs. KING and CALHOUN opposed it, it was laid on the table for the purpose of taking up the special order.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands, and the bill was reported, as amended, to the Senate; when, the question on concurring with the amendments made in committee coming up, the first amendment was concurred in.

After some remarks from Messrs. BUCHANAN, CLAY of Alabama, BENTON, MORRIS, NILES, PRESTON, RIVES, and WALKER, the question was taken on concurring in the amendment allowing the entry by actual settlers of lands that have been fifteen years in the market at fifty cents per acre; which amendment was rejected—yeas 21, nays 23.

Mr. RIVES then moved to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. MORRIS, after some remarks, moved an adjournment, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. WALL, to enable him to make a report; when

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill to reorganize the district courts of the United States in the State of Alabama, reported the same without amendment.

The question was then taken on Mr. MORRIS's motion to adjourn, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Swift, Wall, White, and Williams of Maine—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—23.

The Senate then adjourned over until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1839.

The SPEAKER having proceeded to call the committees for reports,

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Chauncey Calhoun; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of C. H. Beard and J. Gray; which was laid on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Easton and wife, representatives of Captain Robert D. Richardson, and the petition of A. B. Wills; which were severally laid on the table.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Tacle Savage, administrator of Bolidia Laws, deceased; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George B. D. Peysters, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw the papers.

Mr. GIDDINGS also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report upon the memorial of David R. Denham, and other citizens of the Territory of Florida; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of John McColgan; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the following bills; which were read twice and committed, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of W. B. Lindsay;

A bill for the relief of Philip Catner;
A bill for the relief of Isaac Miller; and
A bill for the relief of Peter Samuel Jaccard.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the following bills; which were read twice and committed:

A bill for the relief of the heirs of John D. Treville; and

A bill for the relief of Richard Shubrick.

Mr. HARLAN, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petition of Robert Carey, of New York, and the petition of William Brown; which were severally laid upon the table.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the relief of the heirs-at-law of Captain Frederick M. Bell, deceased; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas M. Burland; which was read twice and committed.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Richard Brannin.

On motion of Mr. BELL, a certain communication from the Department of War in relation to the appointment of an agent to the Osages, was committed to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRONSON, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill to define and establish the eastern boundary line of the Territory of Iowa; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. JONES, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations to purchase a library for the use of the Legislative Council and court of appeals of the Territory of Iowa; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Esther Culver; which was laid on the table.

Mr. CRAIG asked the favor of the House to submit a resolution. He could not excuse himself without showing some attention to the subject.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the first Tuesday in February next be set apart for the consideration of House bill No. 546, entitled a bill granting an additional quantity of land for the location of revolutionary bounty land warrants. The said bill to take precedence of all other business of that day.

Objection was made to its reception.

PUBLIC DEFAULTERS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the resolution of Mr. Wise for the printing of twenty thousand extra copies each of documents No. 297 and No. 13, relating to the defalcations of public officers.

Mr. WHITTLESEY was convinced that five thousand extra copies would be amply sufficient for distribution among members of the House, and for the use of the public press; as, if twenty thousand were ordered, they would not be sufficient for a general distribution. He, therefore, moved to amend the resolution by striking out "twenty thousand," and inserting "five thousand."

Mr. MITCHELL thought sufficient time had already been wasted on the subject. He would, therefore, move the previous question.

The call for the previous question being seconded, it was ordered—yeas 71, nays 65—thereby cutting off the amendment of Mr. WHITTLESEY.

The question then recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

On that motion Mr. WISE demanded the yeas and nays, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. PETRIKIN inquired if it would be in order to move a division of the question?

The SPEAKER said it would.

Mr. PETRIKIN then demanded a division; and the yeas and nays having been ordered,

On motion of Mr. GRIFFIN, the question was taken on the first branch of the resolution, in the following words:

Resolved, That the twenty thousand extra copies of Document No. 297, of the second session of the Twenty-Fifth Congress, and a like number extra of Document No. 13, of the present session, the former relating to the public defaulters, the latter to the defalcation of Samuel Swartwout, be printed for the use of this House.

This branch of the resolution was agreed to—yeas 100, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, John W. Allen, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Clowney, Coffin, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darling, Dawson, Deberry, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Kennedy, Lewis, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Sampson, Mason, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Pearce, Potts, Pratt, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Smith, Snyder, Southgate, Stanley, Stuart, Stone, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bronson, Buchanan, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Donean, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hamer, Hawkins, Haynes, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Loomis, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Paris, Paynter, Pettrikin, Phelps, Plumer, John H. Prentiss, Rhett, Rives, Sawyer, Sheffer, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Spencer, Swearingen, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Weeks, Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—82.

The question was then taken on the second branch, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House—

1. What defalcations by receivers and collectors, or other depositaries of the public moneys, have taken place since the 1st of October, 1837; the names of the defaulters, and when and where it took place, and what amount.

2. What amount has been paid, or what balances appearing due from defaulters in the report of the 17th of January last, have been adjusted and reduced; and that he be required to report to this House all the correspondence touching defalcations of receivers and collectors of the public money since the Department furnished document No. 297.

The question on this branch was decided in the affirmative—yeas 185, nays 7.

NAVY-YARD AT BROOKLYN.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill for the improvement of the navy-yard at Brooklyn, and the construction of a dry-dock at the same, with the amendments pending thereto.

Mr. EVANS being entitled to the floor, spoke at some length, principally in reply to the remarks of Messrs. THOMPSON and ELMORE, of yesterday.

Messrs. LEGARE, TILLINGHAST, JENIFER, THOMPSON, and KEIM continued the debate.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. THOMPSON, proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the erection of a dry-dock at Pensacola; and it was decided in the negative.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. PAYNTER, to appropriate $100,000 for the establishment of a dry-dock at Philadelphia; which was decided in the negative.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; which was decided in the negative.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of the following bills:

A bill (No. 573) to regulate the pay and emoluments of pursers in the Navy;

A bill (No. 572) to alter and regulate the Navy ration;

A bill (No. 570) to authorize the purchase of two vessels to be employed as receiving vessels in the naval service;

A bill (No. 571) for reducing, under one head of appropriations, various appropriations for building, rebuilding, purchasing, and repairing vessels of war, and for providing materials for the same;

A bill (No. 525) for the payment of certain pensions heretofore paid out of the privateer pension fund; and

A bill (No. 526) to reorganize the marine corps

The committee, after spending some time in the discussion of these various bills, rose and reported to the House, without amendment, bills No. 525, 570, and 571; and No. 572 and 573 with amendments; and that upon bill No. 526 they had come to no decision.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with the act of Congress of the 20th of September, 1818, showing the names of the clerks employed during the year 1838 in that Department.

Also, a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st ultimo, calling for the quantity of lands belonging to the General Government in that part of the Edwardsville and Kaskaskia district in Illinois, which comprises the American Bottom, and the number of years the said land has been subject to entry.

On motion of Mr. CASEY, referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with an act of Congress, transmitting a statement showing the payments made according to law by the Treasury, during the year 1838.

Also, a statement of the same Department, showing the expenditures and receipts of the marine hospital fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen; which was laid on the table.

On motion, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 12, 1839.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to grant a register to Simon Meneghatty.

Mr. C. said he wished to call the attention of the House to this bill. The individual for whose benefit it is, purchased a foreign vessel, upon which it is his design to put repairs, after which it is his intention to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to him a register. It being a foreign bottom, will require the passage of an act for that purpose. He hoped the House would agree to have the bill disposed of.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired if the individual complied with the law, by expending three fourths of the original cost.

Mr. CUSHMAN said that the Secretary would not be authorized until the owner has expended upon it three fourths of the original cost.

The bill was then read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Commerce, made an unfavorable report upon the petition of Francis Watkins; and it was laid on the table.

Mr. M., from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petitions of Caleb Williams and Stephen W. Hunt; and it was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the House of the 31st December, in relation to the repeal of the punishment by lashes and stripes in the Army and marine corps.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill to provide for the erection of a fire proof building for the use of the General Post Office Department.

Mr. ADAMS suggested to his colleague that he would, as chairman of the committee upon that subject, move to take up the joint resolution proposing to pay the workmen engaged upon the public buildings. He said they were suffering deep distress in consequence of withholding their pay; and unless it be taken up out of its order upon the Calendar, by the consent of the House, it would not receive the action of the House this session. The claim is of such a nature that those persons concerned could recover it in a court of law. They are hard working mechanics, and who are, no doubt, necessitated for the amount withheld from them.

Mr. LINCOLN suggested to Mr. A. to delay the motion until the reports of committees had been gone through with. To which suggestion Mr. A. acceded.

Mr. CLOWNEY, from the Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of War, made a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to require from Samuel Lewis the repayment of the sum of $800, improperly allowed to him for the services of his son Edward, (a minor,) as clerk in the Pension bureau, from July, 1818, to July, 1819, together with interest from the day he received the same; and upon the refusal or neglect of the said Samuel Lewis to refund the said sum of money, with interest, that the Attorney General of the United States be, and he is hereby, instructed forthwith to institute proper legal proceedings for the recovery of the same.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that the report be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. WISE hoped, as this was the first report made from that committee since he had been a member of this House, it would receive the action of the House immediately.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he had not heard the resolution read, and must persist in his motion; but,

On motion of Mr. CLOWNEY, it was made the order of the day for Saturday week next.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the select committee appointed last session, and authorized to continue during the present session, on the subject of a national foundry, on leave, reported a bill for that object. It was read twice, committed, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

BILLS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the following Senate bills on the Speaker's table were taken up, read a first and second time, and referred:

An act to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the ten per cent. fund, arising from the sale of the public lands.

An act further to regulate the transportation of the mail upon railroads.

An act making appropriation for the support of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia; together with several private bills.

Also, a joint resolution of the Senate, asking the concurrence of the House, and the appointment of a committee on its part to act with a committee of the Senate, to consider the best means of carrying into effect the objects of the Smithsonian bequest.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, the resolution was concurred in, and the Speaker authorized to appoint a committee, consisting of nine, on the part of the House.

FALMOUTH AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD.

Mr. BOULDIN called the attention of the House to an engrossed bill, then on the Speaker's table, relating to the incorporation of the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company. He stated that, since the bill had been ordered to its third reading, he had received numerous communications on the subject in opposition to the bill. On that account, and with a view of considering the objection urged, he moved a recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend by recommending the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with the following instructions:

To report a bill with all the reservations, restrictions, and provisions, contained in "An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831. And further, that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of further amending said bill, to provide for the payment, by said railroad company, to the corporation of the city of Washington, of ten cents, or some other sum, for each and every passenger carried into or from said city of Washington, on said road; and also to make such provisions as will prevent said railroad company from asking an unreasonable and exorbitant price for carrying the United States mail on said road.

After a desultory debate, the amendment was rejected, and the motion of Mr. BOULDIN agreed to.

So the bill was recommitted.

WORKMEN ON THE TREASURY.

Mr. LINCOLN asked leave to submit a motion to call up for consideration the engrossed joint resolution for the relief of certain workmen employed on the Treasury building.

Mr. CHAMBERS objected to the resolution having precedence of other subjects before it.

Mr. LINCOLN then moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to submit his motion, but subsequently withdrew it, upon the understanding that no objection would be made to the resolution when it should come up in its regular order.

DEFALCATION OF SWARTWOUT.

Mr. CURTIS asked leave to submit a resolution for the printing of twenty thousand copies of Documents Nos. 54 and 69, communicated by the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the late defalcation of Samuel Swartwout, to be printed with the documents already ordered by the House.

Objection being made,

Mr. CURTIS moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to submit his resolution.

On that motion Mr. SMITH demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 107, nays 77—not two thirds.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that on Tuesday next he should ask the House to consider some of the appropriation bills.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, being engrossed bills and joint resolutions entitled:

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Captain Thomas Triplett;

A bill for the relief of Smith and Town;

A bill for the relief of Levi Chadwick;

A joint resolution authorizing an examination and payment of the claims of the workmen upon the public buildings;

A joint resolution for the relief of the heirs of Charles Brown, deceased;

A joint resolution for the relief of the heirs of Captain Frederick M. Bell; and

A bill to authorize the issuing of a register to Anthony C. Meneghatty, of the brig Sarah.

Which bills and joint resolutions were severally read the third time, and passed.

The House then proceeded to consider the bills on the Speaker's table, which had been reported from the Committee of the Whole, and were on their third reading.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Thomas Glascock.

The question was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in striking from this bill so much as proposed to give interest upon commutation.

The amendment of the committee was advocated by Mr. CUSHMAN, and opposed by Messrs. TALIAFERRO, HAYNES, UNDERWOOD, and CRAIG.

Said bill was then read the second time, and ordered to be engrossed.

A bill for the relief of Larkin Smith was next taken up; and after a debate, in which Messrs. CRAIG and HALL participated in opposition to, and Mr. TALIAFERRO in favor of, its engrossment, the question was taken thereon by yeas and nays, on the demand of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and rejected—yeas 64, nays 79.

A bill for the relief of William Madison was next taken up.

A debate of considerable length took place upon this bill, in which Messrs. TALIAFERRO and BANKS advocated, and Messrs. HALL, UNDERWOOD, and CRAIG opposed, its passage; after which,

The question was taken, whether said bill should be engrossed for a third reading; and decided in the negative. It is consequently rejected.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with an act of Congress, transmitting a statement of the number of clerks employed in that Department during the year 1838; which was laid on the table.

Also, a communication from the same Department, in answer to a resolution of the House, relating to the defalcation of General Gratiot.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked leave, and presented to the House a letter from General Gratiot, which had been addressed to him, giving his version of his transactions with the Government; which letter, at the request of Mr. U., was ordered to be printed, in connection with the report from the Secretary of War.

On motion of Mr. WISE, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 14, 1839.

Mr. CUTBERT, of Georgia, Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. SPENCE, of Maryland, appeared in their places in the Senate this morning.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the Register of the Treasury, showing the payments made during the year 1838, not otherwise provided for; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the names and compensation of the clerks employed in that Department during the year 1838; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief Engineer respecting works of improvement in harbors; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the names and compensation of the clerks employed in that Department during the year 1838; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Commissioner of the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

RESOLUTIONS OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BROWN said he rose to present to the Senate certain resolutions which had been adopted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, at their late session, expressive of their views and opinions in regard to some of the important measures and questions of public policy which have been, and now are, pending before the country. However uncourteous some of the language was in reference to a late act of this body, which it had performed in the exercise of its high constitutional powers, and profoundly as he regretted that expressions derogating from the respect due this body were embraced in the resolutions, yet he could not hesitate, in obedience to a proper sense of respect to the Legislature of his State, to offer them, in compliance with the request contained in one of the resolutions.

It was alike due to himself, to his constituents, and to the importance of the occasion itself, to state very explicitly the view he took of the resolutions, and the course which high considerations of public duty required that he should pursue in regard to them. He felt the deep responsibility under which he acted, and had given to the subject that anxious deliberation which its public importance, and the great questions of public interest involved in it, demanded.

In regard to most of the resolutions, it would readily be perceived that the opinions expressed in them directly conflict with the course which he had heretofore pursued on the measures of public policy to which they refer, and that a principle is asserted in one of them, in regard to a question of constitutional power, entirely at variance with his vote on the resolution ordering the expunction of the condemnatory resolution passed against President Jackson, for removing the public deposits from the late Bank of the United States. In relation to extravagant expenditure and Executive patronage, referred to by two others of the resolutions, his votes would most abundantly prove that his whole course had been, since honored with a seat in that body, to diminish both as far as it was practicable for him to do so.

Having very briefly adverted to the political character of the resolutions, the next inquiry which presents itself for consideration is, whether they are to be viewed by my honorable colleague and myself as instructions, or as the mere expressions of the opinions of the Legislature, leaving to us a discretionary power in exercising our judgments on the subjects to which they relate. That they are not to be considered as instructions the proofs, to his mind, were clear and irresistible. They do not, on their face, profess to instruct, but, on the contrary, that word, or any other of mandatory import, is omitted with the most guarded caution; omitted, no doubt, not by accident, but by design. What could have been the intention for omitting it? The motive clearly was not to commit the party passing these resolutions to the doctrine of instructions. Whenever (said Mr. B.) the General Assembly of North Carolina has thought proper, on former occasions, to resort to the great republican principle of instruction, it has spoken out in bold, frank, and unequivocal language. It has, by directly instructing the Senators representing the State, taken the responsibility on itself of the vote which it commanded them to give. A positive command, by instructions, from the Legislature of a State to its Senators to give a particular vote, places the vote under the control of the Legislature, and is, in effect, the vote of the power commanding it; thereby taking from the Senator all discretion, and consequently relieving him of all responsibility to the people of the State. The Legislature, therefore, does not take on itself the responsibility of the Senator's vote unless it instructs him. On the contrary, if it declines to instruct him, it declines taking the responsibility of his vote, and therefore has no right to expect him to express their opinions when they refuse to take on themselves the consequences of his vote to the people of the State. The Legislature of North Carolina has long since established the principle that they had the right to instruct; and so essential has the employment of that word been considered to the efficacy of resolutions of instruction, that the Republicans of that State have invariably employed it on all great occasions when they intended to command the votes of their Senators.

Mr. B. said, in referring to the Journals of the Senate, he perceived that the late venerable Mr. Macon, then a member of this body, had presented resolutions, passed by the Legislature of North Carolina, at their session in 1816, instructing their Senators to endeavor to procure certain amendments to the Constitution in relation to the mode of electing President and Vice President of the United States. The Legislature which adopted them resolved, in one of the resolutions, "that our Senators in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to endeavor to obtain the said amendment to the Constitution of the United States." At the succeeding session of the Legislature of North Carolina the same resolutions were again adopted, and again asserted, in the same language, the right of instruction. That the General Assembly then considered mandatory language as essential to instructions is most strikingly obvious, from the marked distinction between the terms employed by them in the resolutions to the Senators and the Representatives in Congress. The former are expressly "instructed," the latter are merely "requested," to perform their will. It is, therefore, perfectly clear, from the use of the latter term to the Representatives in Congress, over whose votes the Legislature never professed to have any control, that a mere expression of opinion, unaccompanied by instructions never was viewed by them as obligatory on those to whom they were addressed. This great right had been repeatedly since asserted, and exercised in the same language of command, to their Senators by successive Legislatures of North Carolina, from the period just referred to down to its session of 1834, when they reasserted and exercised, in positive and unequivocal language, the right of instruction on the question of expunging from the Journals of the Senate of the United States the resolutions condemnatory of President Jackson. The long continued practice, therefore, of the Legislature of that State in regard to instructions, shows very conclusively that whenever they have intended to take all discretion from their Senators in regard to any particular vote, they have expressly, and in plain language, instructed.

Mr. B. said he held, when resolutions directly instructing had passed a legislative body, that it was not competent to go beyond the instructions themselves to ascertain the meaning of the Legislature; but when instructions were not given, on the face of the resolutions, that it was competent to look beyond them to arrive at the intentions of those passing them. He adverted to an amendment offered in both branches of the Legislature, when the resolutions were before them, proposing to insert the word "instruct," and which was rejected by the unanimous vote of the friends of the resolutions, in both instances. This act, in his opinion, was decisive of the question, and proved that those who passed them did not intend to commit themselves, by their acts, to the doctrine of instruction.

The resolutions did not merely omit to instruct; but they contained, on their face, expressions which constituted a direct attack on that great fundamental principle of the republican creed. They declare that act of the Senate of the United States, expunging from its Journals the condemnatory resolution against President Jackson, to have been "an act of party servility, calculated to degrade the Senate."

Mr. B. said, so far as his own vote had had any agency in carrying into effect that just sentence, vindictory of the Constitution and the liberties of the people, both of which had been wantonly assailed in the unauthorized and unjust sentence against the Chief Magistrate of the nation, that he had acted under resolutions passed by the Legislature of his State commanding it to be done. He believed a majority of the State Legislatures of the Union had also passed similar instructions to their Senators. If, therefore, the doctrine of instruction be correct, what power is there that can rightfully arraign the motives of those who have only acted in obedience to it, and carried out the will of those under whose commands they have performed the act required to be done? To impeach, therefore, the motives of those, thus acting under instructions, is a direct attack on the principle of instruction, and, in effect, a denial of the right to instruct.

But in order to have all doubt removed as to the intention of those who passed them, his honorable colleague and himself had addressed a respectful communication to the Legislature of their State, asking to be informed if the resolutions were to be taken as instructions. We had publicly declared that we would obey or resign, if instructed. We considered that to have done either, under resolutions not containing instructions, was not required by our pledge, and would have been a manifest dereliction of public duty, under all the circumstances. We desired, then, proper ground to stand on. If we resigned, we wished to do so under the great principle of instruction, and not under resolutions in which it was not recognized. The Legislature, thus candidly and respectfully appealed to, have refused in terms not very courteous, to give any further information as to the question of instruction.

When the issue was thus fairly presented, we had a right to expect, on every principle of candor, an emphatic expression of opinion, one way or the other, in regard to the intentions of the Legislature on the question of instruction. If they had asserted their intention to instruct, I was prepared, as is known to many of my friends, instantly to have surrendered to them the public trust which I hold. They, however, again decline to assert the principle of instruction, in the resolution passed by them, and thus afford clear and unquestionable proof that they do not intend to commit themselves to the doctrine. Which of the parties had acted in good faith—those addressing the communication, and soliciting an expression of opinion on a plain question to which an answer was easy, and which they deemed important to the public liberty, as well as to the regulation of their own conduct, or those who had declined to answer it? He would appeal to the honest and intelligent judgment of his constituents to decide.

When, therefore, he took into view the circumstances which formed a part of the history of the resolutions—the guarded caution with which the party passing them avoided committing themselves on the record to the right of instruction, and the open and avowed hostility of some of those voting for the resolutions to the doctrine of instruction, the direct attack on that great principle itself, on the face of the resolutions, and the refusal of the Legislature, on a candid appeal made to them, to assert the right—the most irresistible proof is afforded, by positive acts, that they (the Legislature) did not intend to recognize the right of instruction; and if not, on what principle of honor, or by what right, either moral or political, can it be expected that they will be considered and acted on by others as instructions?

The resolutions profess to speak the will of the people. If they were instructions, he admitted that they would be obligatory in the fullest sense of the term; but they were not, and did not profess to be, and therefore the question, as respects public opinion, as well as every other in relation to them, is open to the freest inquiry. He did not, himself believe that they expressed public opinion as to many of the important topics on which they undertake to declare it. He believed the people of the State had heard with utter surprise that the subject of the expunging resolutions had been introduced. It was a topic that had not been brought before them at the election, and therefore could not have been anticipated. Again, he did not believe they expressed public opinion, as no question had ever been brought more directly and immediately before the people of North Carolina than that was, at the elections in 1834, involving the course of President Jackson in regard to the Bank of the United States, and the justice of expunging the sentence pronounced against him from the Journals of the Senate.

The Legislature, at its session of 1834, in obedience to that public will, commanded their Senators, by express instructions, to vote for it. The people elected two successive Legislatures which ratified and reaffirmed, in effect, that decision, as the resolutions remained unrevoked by them. It would, therefore, be in derogation of the well known political consistency of the people of North Carolina to suppose that a decision so well considered, and so deliberately made, had been reversed by them. No President had ever been more strongly sustained than was President Jackson, at three successive elections, by the people of that State, whose well-earned fame the resolutions which the Legislature had passed aimed so strong a blow at. He could not, therefore, admit that his constituents had abandoned their long-cherished political attachments, and were prepared to aid in sacrificing the public character of the honest soldier and patriot statesman. He could not consent, therefore, to record, by his vote, a sentence so derogatory to the people and to the Legislature of 1834, to whose favor he was indebted for his reelection. To resign would, in his opinion, be a tacit admission, on his part, that the people had changed their opinion on this question, and an acquiescence in the charge of inconsistency against them, (which it involved,) which he should consider it a departure from his duty to do, unless acting under instructions that left him no other alternative.

He had declared, in his speech on the constitutional Treasury, and on other occasions, that, if instructed by his Legislature, he would obey or resign. He had used the word in that sense which conveys a meaning universally acted on and understood by the Republican party of this country; and had likewise asserted it, in his speeches, to be a duty, in the absence of instructions, to pursue the dictates of his own judgment. In the absence of instructions, therefore, his decision as to the present resolutions, which did not recognize, in any part of them, that right, was entirely consistent with his often-repeated declarations on that subject.

The course which his colleague and himself felt bound to take, from a high sense of public duty, on this occasion, involved not simply the question of what was due to themselves and their own principles—not simply a question of mere party ascendancy, but it involved questions of far more transcendent importance. It involved a great principle of popular liberty. If they resigned their seats, they indirectly aided in attacking the great fundamental right of instruction, which the resolutions, on their face, not only attacked, as he had already shown, but, by their unquestionable tendency, went to overthrow. They, in effect, as he had shown, contained a denial of that doctrine. For us, therefore, to acquiesce in them, by obedience or resignation, would aid in subverting a principle long consecrated in the Republican creed. If they suffered themselves, by indirection, to be driven from the post which the public had assigned them, he could not permit himself to doubt that the very party that had passed the resolutions, would point to them to prove that their political friends had never admitted the doctrine of instruction. We should thus be accessory to the establishment of the doctrine that the people, through their Legislature, had no right to instruct. We should thus contribute to establish the doctrine that Senators of the Federal party, if hereafter elected from the State, would be licensed to disobey instructions, and should be irresponsible to the people, as they would no doubt quote these very resolutions to prove that instructions were no part of their political creed. It would, therefore, he repeated, be, in effect, an attack on the doctrine of instruction, if we acquiesced in them either by obedience or resignation, and would be a surrender of a great question of public liberty. Thus we should be placing in the hands of a political party, already denying the right of instruction and asserting other dangerous doctrines in regard to popular rights, an immense engine to beat down those rights. It was placing in their hands an instrument which would serve as a sword to use against their political adversaries, and would at the same time be used as a shield to shelter and protect themselves, when in power, from instructions. He, therefore, should consider the abandonment of his post, under such circumstances, as an abandonment of his duty to the people whom he represented, and as betraying a want of firmness to meet the crisis. He could not respect himself if he were to do it, and he sincerely trusted that his highminded and intelligent constituents would appreciate his motives and the delicacy of his situation. He had been sustained by them with a firmness and fixedness of purpose, for a period of more than nine years, through many trying and difficult events in public affairs, that impressed him with an indelible sense of gratitude.

He had never sought office nor desired it for himself; nor had any of those connected with him ever, through his means, enjoyed office under this or the past Administration. He, therefore, appealed to his constituents to decide how far the charge of "party servility" applied to him, or to his public course. In order to remove all doubts as to the motives which actuated him, and to show that he desired his public course should be tested by the popular will of his State, at the first State elections which intervened, he had come to the determination to resign his seat in the Senate of the United States to the next Legislature of his State, when they should assemble, for the residue of his term then remaining.

Mr. B. said that he felt deeply, and to its fullest extent, the great responsibility of his present situation. But at a great crisis in our public affairs, when the very existence of free Government was at stake, when an evident effort was making to strip the people of their political sovereignty, and, in effect, to transfer it to the banking corporations of the country, he should dare to do his duty. To falter under such circumstances, and in such a crisis, and to shrink from a just responsibility from a fear of consequences, would, while it betrayed an unbecoming timidity, be treachery to those who had committed to him their dearest rights and interests. His course, therefore, was taken, and it was for his constituents to decide on it; and to that decision he was prepared to yield with entire deference.

Mr. STRANGE said: It is with great reluctance, Mr. President, that I occupy the public time and attention of the Senate, upon matters which seem properly to rest between our constituents and my colleague and myself. Two considerations, however, prompt me to occupy a portion of both. The one is, the established practice, so far as I am able to judge, prevailing in this body, on like occasions; and the other, its being, in my judgment, the most convenient and respectful mode of throwing immediately before our constituents our purposes, with a short statement of the reasons which govern us. I find myself in one of the most responsible positions I have ever occupied, and my anxious wish has been so to act as to insure, at least, the unwavering approbation of my own conscience. From my political adversaries, I have learned to know, by sad experience, that I have no favor to hope for, and not even justice to expect. Act as I may, my conduct will be misrepresented and my motives impeached. Even from my political friends, I have reason to apprehend division in their judgment of my course, while I know they will do justice to my motives.

The resolutions just read come from a source entitled to my highest respect and most deferential consideration. They are from the Legislature of a State to which I am deeply indebted, ways without number. Though but an adopted son of that State, she has heaped upon me kindnesses far, very far, beyond my deserts; and I have enjoyed golden opinions far beyond my merits from all sorts of people. Though not a native of the State, there has my heart found the objects of its tenderest affections, and thither does it turn instinctively when that magic word "home" stirs within it those holy associations which no other word has power to awaken. Coming, then, from such a source, how gladly would I have found myself able to follow in any direction to which they might point! how cheerfully have reposed upon such a counselor, and thrown off the responsibility of acting upon my own fallible judgment! Had these resolutions been couched in terms of command, no alternative would have been left me but obedience or resignation. Coming, as they do, merely in the language of counsel or advice, I should unhesitatingly follow that counsel could I do so consistently with my sense of duty and my own self-respect. But the first two of these resolutions counsel me to that which not all the terrors of an auto de fe could induce me to perform. Gracious heaven! to place upon the everlasting records of my country my own declaration that I had violated her Constitution, upon the infamous motive of party servility! No! sooner would I bite off my tongue, and spit it back in the faces of those who had counseled such infamy, however high and dignified the stations they might fill. No! conscious as I am of having been actuated in what I did by motives the highest, the purest, the most patriotic, I am proud to have my name associated with the act, and am content that posterity may judge of me by it alone. Mistaken I may have been, but never was corruption further from my heart. If those were corrupt who did the deed, what were the Legislatures of the noble States who commanded it to be done? I myself, in the part I acted, but conformed to the express instructions of the Legislature of North Carolina. A Legislature elected when that question was distinctly before the people; and, notwithstanding those instructions were given, a Legislature a majority of which was favorable to those instructions was again elected. I could not, therefore, with proper respect to the Legislature and people of North Carolina by whose command the act was done, censure it in the manner proposed, if there was nothing else to restrain me.

Far be it from me, in thus remarking upon the resolutions, to impeach the motives or impugn the conduct of those who passed them. My own opinion is, that family quarrels should never be carried beyond the paternal domain; and, if I have anything to complain of in the temper, language, or substance of these resolutions, on a different theater will that complaint be made. Here, at least, it is my wish and my purpose always to speak respectfully of those whom the people of North Carolina shall see fit to elevate to high places.

The terms of the resolution having placed conformity to them entirely out of the question, it remains to be considered what is my alternative course. Were I at liberty to consult the suggestions of impassioned personal pride, I should certainly resign. It is always easier to retreat from a difficulty or danger than to encounter it, and abide the issue. When a man gets into a political difficulty, the shades of private life have many attractive charms, and upon them he is apt to cast a wishful eye. For my part, I acknowledge that I feel myself in a political difficulty, from which I would willingly retreat, if I might do so with propriety. But the question is one of duty simply, and not of choice. If it is not my duty to resign, it is my duty to remain here. One or the other is clearly obligatory on me; and which, is the question? As I said before, had these resolutions been couched in the language of command, obedience or resignation would have been my duty. I accepted the trust I now hold, under the full knowledge that those who sent me here expected me to obey instructions when received, or resign. Such is the creed of the political party that elected me, and I should disappoint their expectations if I refused to act upon that principle; but, on the other hand, I should be guilty of treachery to them if, upon any other ground than a high sense of duty, I surrendered the post to which they have assigned me. If the legislative elections in North Carolina were shortly to occur, my position would be clear of all difficulty. I would at once, at the close of this session, return back to the people the trust I hold, to be conferred by them according to their pleasure. But in the long interval to ensue before another election in that State, very calamitous results might, in my apprehension, attend an immediate resignation. Every man knows that a most important political struggle is now going on in the land, pregnant, as all admit, with the most interesting consequences. Each party is full of hope, and expects victory in the issue. A feather may turn the scale. The diminution of force on one side, or a slight accession on the other, may decide the controversy. And shall I cast a feather into the scale of my adversaries? It is my duty to stand here, and do my utmost in advancement of those principles which I hold sacred. It is my duty, if for no other reason but to keep those out who would certainly be sent in my place. I know there are many men of both parties in North Carolina who are better qualified than myself to fill this station. But of the many able sons of North Carolina who differ with me in political opinions, and for whom I have the highest personal respect, I should reluctantly see any one here at the present moment. Those who sent me here, therefore, have a right to expect that I will maintain my post, unless driven from it by some paramount principle, and that I do not abandon it in a cowardly manner, upon the occurrence of the first difficulty. There is but one great and paramount principle which can be for a moment supposed to demand my resignation; and that is the doctrine of instruction. Upon that doctrine my colleague has fully and ably enlarged.

Am I, then, by any creed upon that subject, placed in a situation to render my resignation a duty? Of the political party of which a majority of those who voted for these resolutions constitute a part, it is a principle that there is no right in the Legislature to instruct, and, consequently, no obligation on the part of the Senator either to obey or resign. No complaint, therefore, can be made by them of any course which we may think proper to adopt. Of the political party to which I have been attached, the creed is to be found in Mr. Leigh's celebrated report in the Virginia Legislature, and in the uniform practice of all those Legislatures who have attempted any efficient action in Federal affairs. In the document before mentioned it is said, "Senators are instructed, and Representatives requested;" and it goes on to give the reason for this difference of language, that over the one a right to command is claimed, and towards the other the mere tender of advice. In the one case, they may assume to declare the popular will in the language proper to the expression of will—command; and when so expressed, it must stand for that will, whether really so or not. In the other, their command does not stand for the popular will, and the responsibility still rests upon the Representative to find out what it is. This difference of language has been uniformly used, so far as I am able to learn, in all resolutions adopted by Legislatures of the different States, whenever they have attempted any direct action in Federal affairs. They have assumed that the Legislature is recognized as embodying the popular will of the State, so far as Senators are concerned, whenever they think proper to use language appropriate to the utterance of will. But whenever they adopt only such language as they may with propriety use to a Representative, in addressing their Senators, it is not intended to be more operative upon the one than the other. In the one case, they themselves assume the responsibility, and stand between the Senator and the people of the State. In the other, they do not undertake to utter the public will; but while they suggest, leave the public servant to judge of that will upon his own responsibility. Such has been the obvious understanding of all the preceding Legislatures of North Carolina, who have undertaken to address their agents in this body. From their earliest action, down to 1834, when the resolutions were passed commanding the act now denounced as unconstitutional, and dictated by party servility, they used this peculiar phraseology. Language consists merely of the signs, which, by common consent, have been received as representing particular ideas. Technical language frequently differs from common language. By common consent, the word instructions has received a technical signification, when used in an address by the Legislature of a State to its Senators in Congress. These facts were all known to the Legislature of North Carolina, which passed the resolutions under consideration.

Was, then, the omission of the word uniformly used by the Legislatures heretofore, when they designed direct action upon their Senators, an accidental or whimsical omission merely; and was it intended or believed that those used would be coefficient? I have not the slightest idea that it was. In the first place, the known belief of many who voted for these resolutions that the Legislature has no right to instruct Senators, and consequently that there is no obligation on Senators to obey, forbids the idea. They could not have intended what they believed they had no right to do. Such a suspicion would, I am persuaded, do them great injustice. The just conclusion is, that they meant to do just what they have done—the expression of their belief that public opinion is what they set forth in those resolutions to be their own opinions; believing, most justly, that while they had no right to command, their opinions would be most respectfully considered by their Senators. The omission of the word "instructions" was designed. And why? Because it was well known that a peculiar force and signification was attached to it, and an operation given to it which they did not approve, and therefore did not wish to sanction by its use. That the omission was designed is further proved by the fact, which is a matter of history, that in both Houses a proposed amendment by its insertion was rejected. But to place the matter beyond all doubt, my colleague and myself addressed a joint letter to the Legislature—not inquiring what effect they intended their resolutions to have; not implying a doubt which we did not entertain—but openly declaring what we firmly believed, that we should not hold them as instructions; at the same time declaring our purpose to obey or resign, should we be instructed. This letter was written in the most perfect sincerity and good faith. I care not who may think proper to question it. I can appeal to God and my own conscience for my truth.

But it is also known to friends here, to whom I declared my determination to resign if my construction of the resolutions was pronounced erroneous. It was not so pronounced. We received no answer to our communication. The vindication of my sincerity in addressing that letter, therefore, presents a strong consideration against resignation. If I resign now, it may be justly said that when I wrote my letter to the Legislature I considered these resolutions as instructions, in the face of my declaration to the contrary, and am now borne down by the weight of my conviction. I still think, as I thought then, that they are not instructions either in fact or according to the intention of most of those who voted for them; and so believing, the alternative of obedience or resignation is not presented to me. Is there, then, any obligation upon me to resign? Does any human being perceive any? Who can point it out? Perfect obedience is out of the question. It follows, then, in my judgment, that for the present it is my duty to remain here, and, while I do not treat the resolutions as instructions, I will show them all due respect and give to them such influence over my conduct as my judgment may approve. I have said that had the Legislature met during the ensuing year, I would resign at the close of this session; but it is still my purpose to afford the sovereign people of North Carolina the earliest opportunity of deciding the important question, by what class of politicians they choose to be represented in this body. The Legislature, at its first biennial session, shall have an opportunity of selecting for the seat I fill a Democrat or a Federalist; one who thinks it right to wipe off the foul and unjust stigma cast upon the fame of Andrew Jackson, or one who is for perpetuating it through all generations. This they will have an opportunity of doing, under a fair expression of popular sentiment, and to the people of North Carolina will I cheerfully submit the issue.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, contended that these resolutions were neither indecorous nor disrespectful.

Mr. STRANGE said he made no allusion to disrespectful language.

Mr. CLAY said he understood at least one of the Senators to say that one of the resolutions was disrespectful to the Senate.

Mr. BROWN said he spoke of one of the resolutions; but, emanating as they did from the Legislature of his State, in no possible contingency could he have refused to present them.

Mr. CLAY said, if there was indecorum, it was his duty, under the rules of the Senate, not to present the resolutions.

Mr. BROWN said there was a very marked difference between the Legislature of a sovereign State and individuals on this subject.

Mr. CLAY said he was not aware there was any such distinction in the rules; and if the Legislature of a State uses disrespectful language, it is no more to be received than if it were from a private citizen. But the Senators gave as a reason for not complying with the resolutions of the Legislature, that they did not contain the word "instruct." He thought it was infinitely more respectful to those receiving the instructions, not to use the word "instruct." Sir, suppose I say to my man Charles, "please bring me my boots or shoes;" he does it with alacrity. But if I should say, "Charles, I instruct you to bring me my boots," he would think it strange language, and very probably would ask me for an explanation. Mr. C. said, while the Senators expressed their disinclination so strongly to obeying these instructions, they seemed altogether to overlook that there was an alternative presented to them—that of resignation.

Mr. STRANGE replied, that he certainly felt much indebted to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] for the advice he had seen proper to volunteer on the present occasion. But it had been very long since it had been his wont to look for political information from that quarter. On the contrary, he viewed the Senator from Kentucky, with all his talents, rather as a beacon than a guide, and when a course was indicated by him, generally considered it a reason for shunning, rather than pursuing it. It was not, therefore, to be considered at all remarkable if his suggestions, on the present occasion, should have but little weight. The Senator is pleased to say that he considers my complaint, that I have neither favor nor justice to expect from my political opponents, a little gratuitous. No man knows better where the shoe pinches than he who wears it. The Senator knows nothing of the ground upon which this complaint is made, and has, therefore, no right to say whether it is gratuitous or not. He (Mr. S.) had said, that sad experience had warned him not to expect either favor or justice from his political opponents—and he said so truly. And now that the Senator had somewhat forced it upon him, he would remark, that no man had shown more comity or deference to his political opponents than himself; and yet not only the scurrilous partisan newspapers of the country, but even by those with whom he had exchanged the courtesies of life, and from whom he had parted with the grasp of friendship, had his motives been assailed, and his conduct impeached. With such facts before him, he might well say that he could expect neither favor nor justice from his political opponents. The Senator from Kentucky, with an unfairness and coarseness which he had not thought altogether becoming, had observed, that in remarking upon the impracticability of obedience, he (Mr. S.) and his colleague seemed to have overlooked another alternative, and that was resignation. Now, unless the Senator's senses were less acute than usual, he must have heard both him and his colleague very distinctly advert to that alternative, and himself to declare that were he at liberty to act in obedience to his own feelings, he would resign; but that, under present circumstances, a high sense of duty to those who sent him here compelled him to remain.

The Senator from Kentucky then takes up the doctrine of instruction, and, according to his wont in the absence of argument and reason, attempts to drive us from our position by railery and jest, and for that purpose parades before us that ever favorite and fertile theme, his man Charles, and entertains the Senate with a dialogue between himself and that distinguished personage. But his illustration has no application to the subject. There is no parity between the relationship subsisting between the sovereignty of a State and its representative upon this floor, and that between the Senator and his slave. He was the servant of the people of North Carolina, but not their slave, or the slave of any other man. He served the people of North Carolina, as far as he was able to discern, in compliance with the public will; and when he could not conscientiously conform to that will, he would resign. Poor Charles has no such alternative. If the Senator's title to him is good, he is his slave, and he must yield obedience in whatever way he may think proper to address him; he cannot resign. Whether the Senator from Kentucky is able to perceive any difference in the signification of certain terms, is a matter with which he (Mr. S.) had nothing to do. When the Legislature of Kentucky spoke, it would be for the Senator from Kentucky to interpret its language; and he (Mr. S.) would be very far from indelicately obtruding his advice. But when the Legislature of North Carolina spoke to his colleague and himself, it belonged to them to interpret; and he recognized the right of no one to interfere in the matter.

As he understood the opinions of the people of North Carolina, they recognized a difference between instructions and other language used by the Legislature. When he was elected to his present position, he came into it with a determination to act conformably, as far as possible, to the popular will, the principle which the Senator from Kentucky had admitted to be correct; and the only question was, what was the popular will? He believed a part of the popular will of North Carolina was, that when the Legislature instructed a Senator to vote for or against a particular measure, such instruction should stand with him for the popular will, whatever, in truth, the popular will might be; but that, when not instructed, it was his duty to exercise his best judgment, and ascertain, from the several sources within his reach, what was, upon the whole, the popular will. He believed, therefore, that he would act in conformity to the public will in North Carolina, whenever instructed by the Legislature either to obey or resign; but to treat everything else coming from the Legislature as merely advisory, and conform to it or not, as, in his judgment, it either did or did not concur with the popular will. The Senator from Kentucky intimates that our course of reasoning leads to the conclusion that even if the word instruct had been used, we should have been at liberty to look behind this legislative declaration, and ascertain what was, in fact, the popular will. In his judgment, the reasoning led to no such result, but precisely the contrary. They had expressly stated that they believed it to be the popular will in North Carolina, that whenever the Legislature instructed, such instructions are to be taken as the popular will, and acted upon as such; but in the absence of such instructions, the Senator must, at his own peril, ascertain that will.

The Senator from Kentucky, in conclusion, rather ungenerously, as he thought, chided him and his colleague for not bringing forward these resolutions last week when the land bill was under discussion. If the Senator from Kentucky would tax his recollection, he would find that, at this session of Congress, upon every test question upon the graduation bill, both his colleague and himself had voted against it. As he had said before, he should always vote in conformity to the wishes of his State, so far as he could understand them, when they did not conflict, in his judgment, with any great principle which he had no right to disregard. Last year he voted for the graduation bill under (as he now thought) a mistaken impression that public sentiment in North Carolina, if not in favor of it, was at least quiescent. But he hoped never to see a year when he could not look back and say, "I am wiser this year than I was last." He was now inclined to think that the majority of the people of North Carolina was opposed to the bill, and should therefore unhesitatingly vote against it.

Mr. BROWN, in rising to reply to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who, with his accustomed delicacy, had, in a very extraordinary manner, presented himself before that body to arraign the course of his colleague and himself, said, that at the outset of his remarks he should protest against, and peremptorily challenge, the right of the Senator to interfere in a question purely between themselves and their constituents. What right had the Senator to assume upon himself the authority thus attempted to be exercised by him? From whom did he derive his authority? Where were his credentials? Who had constituted him their attorney, in fact, thus to arraign the course of members on this floor?

Having felt it to be his duty thus emphatically to except to the assumed power of the Senator, and considering that he had been fairly ousted of the jurisdiction that he had sought to assert, he would now go a step further, and say that he should peremptorily decline, from high considerations of what was due to himself and his own rights, to notice any of the topics introduced by him, or to join issue with him on any one of the questions which he seeks to raise, in reference to the manner of discharging our duties as members of this body. If, however, he had considered it incumbent on himself to refuse to join issue with the Senator on any of the topics raised by him, yet there were some other things which it was his purpose to say to him before he concluded his remarks.

In the first place, his constituents would no doubt feel exceedingly obliged to that gentleman, whose political course had long been distinguished for its peculiar devotion to southern interests, for having volunteered, on the present occasion, to appear as the champion of their rights. The friends of the great right of instruction will, no doubt, in every part of the country, learn with no little surprise that the Senator has become its advocate and eulogist! What, (said Mr. B.,) the Senator from Kentucky now assuming to pronounce, with oracular certainty and authority, the true doctrines of the right of instruction! How long, he would ask, had it been since that gentleman had entitled himself to become its teacher and expounder? Was it from the eminent services rendered by him to its principles, when instructions were coming from a majority of the States of this Union to their Senators on this floor, directing them to sustain the late Administration in the mighty conflict then waging against it by the Bank of the United States and the political party acting in concert with it? Who does not remember that gentleman's course on that most important occasion? A majority of the States of this Union, believing that a great crisis in our public affairs had arrived, sent resolutions here to their Senators, instructing them directly and peremptorily—not resolutions so framed as to be, in effect, fraudulent in regard to that great right, but resolutions commanding their Senators, in terms plain and unequivocal, to carry out their wishes. Did the Senator then stand forth as their defender and vindicator? Did he exhort the large number of his political friends, then boldly violating and defying positive instructions, to respect that great doctrine? No, (said Mr. B.,) his course was far otherwise. We then heard daily anathemas from his political friends against instructions; the popular voice was scouted, although it had been expressed in some instances twice or thrice to some of the gentleman's friends, in the shape of positive commands, and standing foremost among those who animated them to resist the will of their constituents, and exhorted them to unyielding firmness in that course, was the Senator from Kentucky himself; and yet he now undertakes to become a lecturer to others on the great principle of instruction!

Who did not remember the reception given in this body, during the famous panic session, to the instructions sent by the patriotic State of New Hampshire to her Senators, the first movement of the kind, directing them to vote for expunging the condemnatory sentence against President Jackson, and to sustain his administration against the war then waged by the Opposition party and the Bank of the United States? The able Republican Senator who presented them was assailed in debate on this floor, his State insulted, and even the common courtesy of printing the resolutions of instruction was refused by the political friends of the Senator, who then held the power in this body. With what propriety, then, he demanded, could a political party, who had trampled on the right of instruction, scorned and contemned the public will by the most highhanded outrages, whenever and wherever they had possessed power—with what propriety could they reproach others in regard to their course, when no instructions had been given them?

His constituents would, no doubt, be exceedingly obliged for the advice of a gentleman in their affairs who had been conspicuously associated as one of the leading members of what was familiarly known, in this country, by the name of the "Coalition Administration." Judging from their past sentiments in regard to it, he did not believe that they possessed, at this time, any very strong desire to witness its restoration to power in any shape. If one member of that bygone Administration had a right to interfere in their affairs, by offering advice, the great political high priest himself who headed it, may, with the same propriety, claim to offer his. And where now is the head of that famous Administration, and what are his daily occupations? Fallen from what was due to the dignity of his former station he is almost daily engaged in the disgusting and wretched pursuit of abolition agitation!

Where, Mr. B. would ask, were the political friends of the Senator from Kentucky, who resided north of the Potomac, with some honorable exceptions, to be found on that question? The great mass of them were found, in the two Houses of Congress, and in the legislative halls of their respective States, pursuing a course of direct hostility to the South. There was not a State Legislature north of the Potomac, in which the political friends of that Senator had obtained power, unless in those where slavery existed, that resolutions attacking the rights and interests of the South on the vitally important question of slavery had not passed! And be it said, to the immortal honor of the Democratic party of the North, who have been so scandalously calumniated by most of the Federal presses of the South on that question, that while their Senators and Representatives, in almost an entire body, have sustained our just rights in the two branches of Congress, there is not a single State north of the Potomac, in which the Democratic party have had the power in its Legislature, that they have not, in the noble spirit of justice and union, passed resolutions strongly sustaining the rights of their sister confederate States of the South!

The Senator from Kentucky had, to illustrate his views of the right of instruction, referred to his own servant, and his obligations to obey his commands, when given by him. In alluding to his remarks on this subject, it was no part of his purpose to join issue with him, and to debate that point, as he intended carefully to preserve the ground taken at the outset of his remarks, not to admit, directly or indirectly, his jurisdiction on this subject, by joining issue with him on any question which he had thought proper to raise; but he would answer him somewhat after the Yankee manner, by asking another question. Let us suppose (said Mr. B.) that a servant who desired occupation, had applied three several times to a farmer or planter for employment, and that that farmer or planter had three times, either from a supposed want of honesty or skill in the applicant, in pretty plain and positive language, rejected his importunities to enter his service; what would be the opinion of the world as to the modesty which, under such circumstances, could venture a fourth opportunity? He thought this very like the case of a distinguished individual who had presented himself three times to the American people to be employed in a certain high station, and who had been three times signally rejected; and, if public rumor was now to be credited, was again prepared for a fourth rebuff by the popular voice.

Again, Mr. B. said his constituents would, no doubt, feel and appreciate a defense, coming from a gentleman whose almost entire public course, for a series of years, has been directly at war with their rights and interests; a Senator whose misallied American system, until thrown off by determined resistance, had, for a series of years, impoverished and desolated the South, oppressed her citizens, and almost ruined her commerce; a Senator whose favorite system of policy he declared most solemnly, in his opinion, had aimed a more fatal blow at the Constitution and Union of the States, than any other and all other measures combined. A system which had, at one time, shaken the pillars of our glorious Confederacy to their very foundations; and which had created, and, he feared, had established those dangerous sectional prejudices and feelings which were destined to endure too long for the harmony and safety of our country.

Mr. B. had now finished saying what he had felt due to himself and to the occasion, and due

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of certain members of the Oneida tribe of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEVIER presented the petition of Benjamin Murphy and John Rogers; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented the petition of John S. Wilson; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIVES presented the petition of Julia L. Weed; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the vote by which the report of the Committee on Pensions, adverse to the memorial of Mrs. Mary W. Thompson, was adopted, was reconsidered, and the report was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. W. then presented a supplemental memorial and papers; which were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the report of the committee was also ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Baltimore, asking for encouragement for the employment of boys in merchant ships; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a memorial from citizens of the northern part of the State of Illinois, for the location of a land office at Milwaukee; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG presented a memorial of similar import to the foregoing; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of William Bayley, a major in the Revolution, asking for bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of the Western Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING presented the petition of Françoise Dagneaux; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. NORVELL presented a communication from the Governor of Michigan, relative to a claim for services of the militia of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. N. accompanied the presentation of the communication with the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of such of the militia of Michigan as were ordered into the service of the United States on the requisition of the marshal of that district, for the maintenance of the neutral obligations and the laws of the United States.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Noah Miller, for remuneration for the capture of a vessel containing clothing and supplies by the enemy during the late war; which was referred.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, presented the memorial of certain citizens of the State of Maine, in favor of a Congress of nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of Albin Michael, introduced a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill granting the right of way over the public lands to the Galena and Chicago Union Railroad Company, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of James Dutton, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill providing for the establishment of the Peoria land district, reported the same without amendment, with a recommendation that the bill do not pass.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill establishing a surveyor general's office for the State of Illinois, reported the same without amendment, with a recommendation that the bill do not pass.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill authorizing the Portage Canal Company to enter lands at the Fox river and Wisconsin portage, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands, &c., reported the same without amendment, with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to discontinue the office of surveyor general in the several districts so soon as the surveys therein made can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and to abolish the office of Solicitor of the Land Office; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. C., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House supplemental to the act entitled "An act to grant preëemption rights to settlers on the public lands," reported the same without amendment.

Also, the bill for the relief of Jane Waller, without amendment.

Also, the bill for the relief of Benjamin Parsons, with an amendment.

On motion by Mr. KING, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois in relation to a survey of the Northern and Western lakes.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the petitions of Amasa Brown and John R. Midwinter, made unfavorable reports thereon.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the petition of Timothy Powers, on the files of last session, were again referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the defense of the Western frontier.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FOSTER, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of Andrew J. Johnston, and Samuel Love; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRESTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of John De Treville, deceased; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

BILLS, ETC., REFERRED.

The following resolutions and bills from the House of Representatives were severally read the first and second time:

Resolution for the relief of the heirs of Charles Brown, deceased.

Resolution for the relief of the heirs-at-law of Captain Frederick M. Bell, deceased; and severally referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The bill for the relief of Levi Chadwick was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The resolution authorizing an examination and payment of the claims of the workmen on the public buildings was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

The bill for the relief of Messrs. Smith and Town was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill to authorize the issuing of a register to Anthony C. Meneghatty, for the sloop Sarah, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

GRANTS TO POLISH EXILES.

Mr. YOUNG said that some days since the Senate, at his motion, had adopted a resolution of inquiry, whether the conditions on which certain grants of land in Illinois were made to Polish exiles had been complied with; and a response had been given by the Department, which was printed, and was now lying on our tables. It seemed from this document, that a selection had been made by the agent of the exiles; but it had not been confirmed by the Department. They were allowed, by the terms of the grant, to select thirty-six sections from three contiguous townships, upon condition that they would go upon the lands, and occupy them for ten consecutive years, at the end of which time they were to receive patents upon the payment of $1 25 per acre, the minimum price of the Government; that four years and upwards of the time limited had gone by, and that there was not, according to the information he had received, a single Polish exile in that part of the country. He further remarked that the agent of these exiles had so located their claim as to include eighteen miles on each side of Rock river, embracing the finest portion of the country, and in many instances interfering with the improvements of the settlers, who would be greatly prejudiced by a confirmation of the selections of land as made by the agent; that another difficulty had occurred by the location of several floating Indian reservations on a part of these same lands; which, having been approved by the President, further legislation had become necessary to enable all the parties concerned to understand their respective rights under the circumstances alluded to; that, in his judgment, whatever right these exiles may have had to an exclusive occupancy of these lands, under the act of Congress passed for their benefit in 1834, that that right had become forfeited by reason of their failure to comply with the conditions of the act, in not occupying the lands, as is required. He concluded by moving a reference of the report to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF NOTES.

The report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, on the memorial of the corporate authorities of Georgetown for an extension of time to redeem their small notes, viz., that the prayer of the memorial be rejected, was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate took up, as the special order, the bill to provide for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands; the question being on the motion of Mr. Rives to postpone the bill indefinitely.

After some remarks from Messrs. WEBSTER and MORRIS, the question was taken; and the motion of indefinite postponement was lost—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Pence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, and Williams of Maine—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Beaton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—27.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted an amendment to make the operations of the bill commence on the 1st of May, 1839, instead of December, 1838; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS offered a substitute to the bill, by way of amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a new bill containing two sections: the first providing for the absolute cession of all the lands that have been twenty years in the market to the States in which they lie, to dispose of them in such manner and at such prices as the Legislatures of said States may think proper; and the second section, that a like session shall be made in future, on the first day of January in each coming year, as shall then have been twenty years in market.

After some remarks from Mr. M. in support of this amendment, and from Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, in reply,

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 14, 1839.

Mr. CRAIG moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill for the relief of the heirs of Larkin Smith was ordered to be engrossed. Mr. C. said his own opinion in favor of the bill remained unshaken; but he had submitted the motion at the desire of others.

The motion was entered, to be taken up when the private orders shall be next reached.

DEFALCATION OF SWARTWOUT.

Mr. HARLAN, premising an intimation that it appeared as if the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had abandoned his motion to raise a select committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, he (Mr. H.) moved now to proceed to its consideration. If it was intended to adopt the resolution, it should be adopted at once; if it was intended to abandon it, let the country know that determination.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, objected to the consideration of the subject at this time, preferring its taking the usual course.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARLAN] had intimated a design on the part of Mr. C. to abandon the resolution, he begged leave to say that, from first to last, he (Mr. C.) had not occupied ten minutes upon it, whereas the gentleman's friends had occupied whole days.

Mr. HARLAN did not press the motion.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolutions were then called for, in the reverse order, commencing with the Territories.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of setting apart a day for the consideration of the resolutions offered by him this day fortnight, in relation to the Mississippi election case, and asked for the yeas and nays.

Both requests were refused almost unanimously.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, and the expectation of the people, that the Congress of the United States should make and enact laws for the general good and welfare of the nation, and to promote the prosperity and happiness of the people; and whereas, instead of making and enacting laws for the general good and welfare of the nation, and to promote the prosperity and happiness of the people, the Congress of the United States seems to be assembled for the purpose of obtaining power for those who are out, and of retaining it for those who are in office, thereby contravening the great object and intention of the framers of the Constitution and the just expectation of the people: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we proceed to the dispatch of the public and private business of the nation and the people, by enacting such laws as will redound to the best interests of the nation, and by the passage of such bills for private claimants as justice and right demand.

Resolved, further, If it is intended not to act upon the public and private business for which we were assembled, but only to remain here for the purpose of making speeches, that Congress ought to be forthwith adjourned, and that the people should hereafter elect members to Congress who will work more and talk less.

Mr. McCURE moved that the resolutions be laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS demanded the question of consideration. This (Mr. A. said) he would not have done, if there was not a precedent of a decision last week upon a petition offered by himself, refusing the reception of that petition on the ground that it was disrespectful to the House. If that petition was disrespectful to the House, these resolutions, he maintained, were much more so. Therefore it was that he asked the question of consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, (amidst some confusion,) was understood to deny that the resolutions were disrespectful to the House, and to say that he held himself responsible to any gentleman who considered himself aggrieved by them.

Mr. DUNCAN and Mr. McCURE rose at the same time to make some remarks, the latter gentleman expressing himself desirous to explain the reasons for the motion he had made.

The SPEAKER said the question of consideration was not debatable, and read the rule applicable to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays on the question of consideration; which were ordered.

The question of consideration being taken, there were—yeas 67, nays 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Atherton, Bicknell, Bronson, Buchanan, Casey, Chaney, Cheatham, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, Davies, Deberry, De Graff, Elmore, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Gallup, Goode, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hamer, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Ingman, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kenble, Klingensmith, Logan, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Noble, Parmenter, Parris, Petrikin, Potter, John H. Prentiss, Richardson, Sheffer, Shepler, Spencer, Stone, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Towns, Vail, Vanderveer, Webster, Weeks, Sherrard Williams, and Jared W. Williams—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Acirigg, Banks, Beatty, Biddle, Boon, Borden, Brodhead, William B. Calhoun, John Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Chapman, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Dromgoole, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, Rice Garland, James Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hoffman, Holsey, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Legare, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Sampson Mason, May, Robert McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Murray, Naylor, Noyes, Parker, Pearce, Peck, Phelps, Potts, Pratt, Kariden, Reed, Ridgway, Rives, Robertson, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Snyder, Stewart, Thomas, Toucey, Albert S. White, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Yell, and Yorke—93.

So the House refused now to consider the resolutions.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, inquired of the Chair whether the resolutions would not come up regularly in their order?

The SPEAKER said that was a question for the consideration of the House. The resolutions having been presented, were now on the Speaker's table, subject to the order of the House.

Mr. WISE rose, and read the following letter:

NEW YORK, January 10, 1839.

MY DEAR SIR: I hope you will pardon the liberty I am about to take in addressing to you this communication, and sincerely hope that the subject of it may be deemed of sufficient importance to meet your early consideration. A difficulty of an extremely aggravating and painful nature has been some time pending between Commodore J. D. Elliott, late commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron, and myself; and although I have repeatedly demanded action on the charges I have lodged against him, I regret to say as yet no notice has been taken of those demands. The point at issue, it appears to me, (and must appear so to every reflecting mind,) involves matter of the highest importance to the naval service of the United States. The decision of this question will determine whether officers in future are tamely and quietly to submit to outrage and insult from a superior, and, agreeably to the regulations of the Navy, receive redress from the Department, or whether they are to take it into their own hands. I have demanded the trial of Commodore Elliott for a most violent, unprovoked, and insulting outrage upon my feelings, committed publicly on a race course near Port Mahon, Island of Minorca, in the presence and hearing of several thousand spectators. I have appealed to the Department for justice, and the only justice I have received is a trial upon that appeal on two different sets of charges preferred by the commander-in-chief; upon both of which I have been fully and honorably acquitted. My wish is that Commodore Elliott may be brought before a court of inquiry for his general conduct while commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron; and that the proceedings of the two courts by which I have been tried, and upon which my charges against him are grounded, may be called for by Congress. This, it appears to me, is at present the only effectual mode of bringing the matter to a final and just issue; and I sincerely hope that (if your other duties will admit of it) you will lend me your aid on this occasion.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. G. HUNTER.

Hon. HENRY A. WISE, Washington.

In connection therewith, Mr. W. offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish this House with certain charges heretofore preferred by C. G. Hunter, of the United States Navy, against Captain J. D. Elliott, of "most violent, insulting outrages upon the feelings and rights of said Hunter, on a race-course, near Port Mahon, Island of Minorca," and of general misconduct while commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron, and to furnish the reasons, if any, why the Department has not heretofore ordered a court of inquiry to sit upon said charges against said Elliott; and to furnish, also, copies of the proceedings of the two courts of inquiry which were ordered to try certain charges preferred by said

Elliott against said Hunter, upon which said Hunter was acquitted, and upon which the charges of said Hunter against said Elliott were founded.

The SPEAKER said that the resolution would, regularly, lie over one day.

Mr. WISE asked its consideration now.

Mr. CRARY suggested an amendment, proposing an inquiry into the circumstances attending the presentation of a certain service of plate to Commodore Elliott.

The SPEAKER said the House had not yet determined to consider the resolution.

And objection being made,

Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rule; which motion was agreed to.

The resolution was considered and adopted.

Resolved, (the Senate concurring herein.) That the joint committee on the Smithsonian bequest be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing a professorship of the German language as a part of the literary instruction in the intended Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. CUSHING said that he was constrained by circumstances, and by the questions raised in various quarters touching his conduct here in the matter of the public lands, to submit a proposition on the subject, which he would have preferred to offer at some other time, when his views might be accompanied with proper explanations and statements, but which he would now submit, to go, with other propositions on the subject, into the hands of the select committee:

Resolved, That, for the purpose of relieving the whole people of the United States from the inconveniences attending the present relation of the Federal Government to the Federal domain, and at the same time securing to the old and new States alike their just and lawful rights therein, the select committee on the public lands be instructed to consider the expediency of providing for the division of the said domain among the several States of the Union, according to the following principles, viz:

1. To ascertain the quantity of said domain of which the title is complete in the United States by the extinction of the Indian occupancy, distinguishing the respective States or Territories in which the same is, and classifying the same according to its quality and value.

2. To fix and establish a just and equitable rule or ratio for measuring the interest of the several States, respectively, in the said domain, allowing, as far as may be, equalized shares thereof, in quantity and in value, to each and all of the said States; the whole subject, however, to the reservations in favor of the new States now existing by law.

3. To make partition of said domain among the individual States, by cession and assignment from the United States, to the said respective States in severalty, and in equalized shares, so as above limited, measured, and ascertained.

4. To distribute and apportion said shares in such wise that the share ceded and assigned to any of those of the States in which the said domain partly lies shall consist, in part or in whole, of lands within its own State limits, thus immediately extinguishing the title of the United States therein so far forth, and vesting the same in the said State.

5. To arrange and apportion the said shares so that the interest in the soil of any one State, to be acquired by any other State or States, in virtue of said partition and cessions, shall be confined to one or more, the smallest number of such other States consistent with the observance of the assumed equal ratio of distribution.

6. To regulate and define, by organic law incorporated in the acts of cession, the relative rights and powers over the lands assigned to one State within the limits of another, which shall be possessed and exercised by each of the said States.

7. To make, repeat, and continue the said equal partition of the Federal domain by successive graduated allotments, under the direction of Congress, until the whole interest of the United States therein be completely extinguished, and vested in the several States.

Mr. CRAIG submitted the following resolution; which was considered and rejected:

Resolved, That the first Tuesday in February next be set apart for the consideration of House bill No. 546, entitled "A bill granting an additional quantity of land for the location of revolutionary bounty land warrants;" the said bill to take precedence of all other business on that day.

Resolved, That the rules of this House be so amended as to substitute the visa voce vote of the members in all cases in which the ballot is at present required.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to communicate to this House, who was the postmaster at Monroe, in the State of Louisiana, on the 1st day of August, in the year 1838, and for six years previous, and who is the postmaster at that office at this time; and if any change has been made, when it was made; that he also communicate whether or not Bernard Hemkin, during the time he was in office, conducted the business in a faithful, methodical, and correct manner; also, that he (the said Postmaster General) do communicate to this House all the documents, letters, or papers of any kind, addressed to him or any of his subordinates, relating to the removal of said Bernard Hemkin from office, (if he has been removed,) and the appointment of his successor.

Mr. LEWIS presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, praying that compensation may be made to certain citizens of said State, for depredations committed by Creek Indians prior to and since the year 1836; which said memorial, accompanied by resolutions of said Legislature in relation thereto, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. EWING, on leave, presented a petition for a mail route from Washington, via Telfir's bridge, Daviess county, to Edwardsport, Knox county, thence to Carlisle, Sullivan county, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ELMORE submitted the following resolutions; which, under the rules, lie over one day:

Resolved, That the several States composing the United States of America are not associated on the principle of unlimited submission to the Federal Government, or to the Houses of Congress or either of them; but that, by the Constitution, the people of said States constituted one General Government, for special purposes, and delegated to that Government certain definite powers, only reserving each State to itself, the residuary mass of right to their own self-government; that, while the Constitution and laws of the United States do attach to the whole people of the several States immediately, in those matters, within the true jurisdiction and confines of said Constitution, and in the mode limited and defined thereby, yet, in all other matters, the said States retain each all its rights; and that to this Constitution each State acceded as a separate sovereign State, and is an integral party, and in its capacity of a sovereign State is represented in Congress by its Senators, duly appointed; that, among the residuary rights, so by each State reserved, is that of fully and freely expressing its opinions on all subjects delegated to the General Government, or touching the infraction of the constitutional compact and of communicating the said opinions to Congress; and that it is the constitutional duty of the Senate and of the House of Representatives respectfully to receive, entertain, and consider, and maturely and deliberately to decide upon all such communications addressed to it by either of the States of this Union; and the summary rejection of the same without their being debated, printed, or referred, or any action whatever had thereon, would be insulting to the honor and injurious to the rights and interests of the said sovereign States of the Union.

2. Resolved, That the Federal Government is a Government of limited and specific powers, derived from the people of the States, thereby confederated and united, and to said Government by them granted under the Constitution; that all powers not delegated to the said United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people; that, therefore, no right of any denomination can be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified, by the Congress, by the Senate or House of Representatives, acting in any capacity, by the President or any Department or officer of the United States, except in the instances wherein power is given by the Constitution for those purposes; and that, among other imprescriptible and essential rights, the freedom of conscience, of speech, of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, are of the original and innate immunity of the said people of the United States—rights of theirs not derived from, or to be weakened by, the common or any other positive law of this or any other country, but inherent in the said people as a people, or under the constitutions of the several States by and to the said people guaranteed and consecrated forever; and which, by reason thereof, cannot be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified, constitutionally, by any of the United States whatsoever, nor in any form of law, whether the same be the act of the two Houses of Congress or of either of them separately: but the same were thus guaranteed in order to protect the citizen against the abuse of power, and not as the means of assailing the right of others; and that to permit one or more States, or their citizens, to convert them into an instrument not of protection, but of assault, against the reserved rights or institutions and peace of the other States or their citizens, or of the Territories and of this District and their citizens, would be a manifest violation of the constitutional compact, a gross breach of the public faith, tending to convert the brotherly love in which the Constitution originated into hatred, and, if not effectually arrested, must subvert the Union itself; and that this body owes a most solemn obligation to itself, and the people of the States which it represents, not to permit itself to be made an instrument or party to an attempt so flagitious and dangerous.

3. Resolved, That the people of the United States did ordain and establish the Constitution thereof, in order amongst other things "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, and to secure the blessings of liberty to them and their posterity;" that to this end the powers of legislation were vested in representative and deliberative assemblies, to wit: a Senate appointed by the States, and a House of Representatives chosen by the people of the States; that, in the exercise of their rights, by the said House of Representatives, and the members thereof, there should be perfect equality and full scope, as far as is consistent with the proper conducting the business of the House, on all subjects within its constitutional jurisdiction; but to permit the members of this House, under the pretext of freedom of debate, to convert it into a hall to discuss questions beyond its jurisdiction, and to denounce and attack the domestic institutions of a portion of these States, essential to their peace, security, and tranquility, and the property of their citizens existing before, and expressly guaranteed by the Constitution itself, would be destructive of all harmony among the members of the body, incompatible with the discharge of its acknowledged duties, and destructive of the great and avowed objects for which the Constitution, this Union created, and this House instituted.

4. Resolved, therefore, That the resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 12th day of December last, which provides that every petition, memorial, and resolution, proposition, or paper, of a prescribed class, "shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid on the table, without being debated, printed, or referred," rests on great and fundamental principles of the Constitution, and on public faith and honor, the observance of which is essential to the peace, tranquility, and security of the States which compose the Confederacy; and the safety and continuance of the Union; and that this House, in adopting the said resolution, has but fulfilled its constitutional obligations and duties, without in anywise infracting the legitimate limits of the right of petition, the freedom of debate, or the constitutional equal rights of the members of this body.

On motion of Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the manner of the expenditure of the $150,000 appropriated during the last session of Congress for the erection and repair of arsenal on the western waters, and to specify the particular expenditure on each.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, of War, of the Navy, and of the Treasury, be respectively directed to inform this House whether the reports of the standing committees of either House of Congress are recognized by the accounting officers in their Departments as a proper foundation upon which to allow a claim against the Government after the same has been rejected; and how many claims, if any, have been allowed within the last two years in consequence of such reports, after the same have been first rejected by the proper accounting officers.

Mr. POPE submitted the following; which was read and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

Whereas, according to the clear intent and meaning of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, and the ninth section of the same article, which provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, the control and safe-keeping of the public moneys belong to the representatives of the people:

1. Therefore, resolved, That a law ought to be passed by Congress to divorce the public purse from the custody and control of the President and all officers removable at his pleasure, and to provide that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, or places designated for the deposit and security of the public money, either by the mandate of the Executive or the judiciary.

2. That the public Treasury ought to be made independent of the executive and judicial departments, and subject only to the control of the Legislature.

3. That the Treasurer of the United States ought to hold his office, not at the pleasure of the President, but during his good behavior, and the term for which he may be appointed, subject to removal only by impeachment, or upon the address of a majority of the House of Representatives and the Senate.

4. That all the officers to be employed or concerned in the collection or receipt of the public revenue, whose compensation does not exceed the sum of ——— dollars, ought to be appointed by the Treasurer of the United States, removable by him for reasonable cause, to be reported to Congress at their next session; but the expression of political opinion, without partisan violence or unbecoming interference in elections, ought not to be deemed cause for removal, and fitness, integrity, and good behavior ought to be the essential requisites in a public officer.

5. That the public dues ought to be paid to the keepers or depositaries of the public money, designated by Congress or under their authority, instead of the collectors and receivers, as now authorized by law.

6. That the guardianship and control of the public money, assigned by the Constitution to the Legislature, has been long held by the enlightened friends of freedom in England and the United States as the best and only effectual security to the liberties of the people, and that all laws necessary and proper ought to be passed to maintain inviolate this essential and only barrier to corrupt administration and arbitrary power.

Mr. HAYNES presented several joint resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia:

First. Requiring the Senators and requesting the Representatives from the State in the Congress of the United States to apply to the proper authorities to have established a mail route three times a week from Augusta, in said State, to Tuscaloosa, in Alabama, to be carried on the Georgia railroad to its western terminus, thence in four-horse coaches.

Second. Requesting the said Senators and Representatives to procure the establishment of a direct mail route from Milledgeville to Rossville.

Third. Requesting the said Senators and Representatives to have a mail route established from Double Wells, on the Georgia railroad, to Washington, in Wilkes county; thence to Clarksville, by Elberton and Clarksville.

Fourth. Requesting the said Senators and Representatives to have a mail route established from Clarksville, by Habersham, to Clayton, in Rabun county; also from Perry's Mills, in Tatnall county, to Eden, in Effingham county; also from Hawkinsville to Troupville.

Fifth. Requesting said Senators and Representatives to procure the establishment of a mail route from the city of Augusta, by Waynesboro', Swansboro', Mount Vernon, Lumber City, Jacksonville, Troupville, and Thomasville, in Georgia, to Tallahassee, in Florida.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to this House the correspondence between that Department and General John W. A. Sandford, as agent of the Creek Indians west of the river Mississippi, including that part of said correspondence touching the supplies purchased by the officers of Government for said Indians, and how said supplies were disposed of, and by whom, and why; also, the correspondence between said agent and that Department in relation to the missionaries among said Indians.

Resolved further, That said Department be instructed to communicate to this House how the supplies, purchased by the Government for the Army, sent to the Cherokee country, during the past year, after the discharge of said Army, were disposed of—the quantity of said supplies sold by the order of the Government—for how much they were sold, and by whom—and the instructions under which said supplies were sold, and such other information touching the disposition of said supplies, which the Secretary may think important to be known to this House; and especially whether any order issued from that Department requiring said supplies to be sold for specie or Treasury notes, and in what kind of funds were said supplies purchased for the Government; whether in the bills of the State banks, or specie and Treasury notes.

The said resolutions were read, and the rule which requires the same to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, they were considered and agreed to.

Mr. TOWNS presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State in Congress to urge the immediate adjustment and settlement of claims for horses, the property of volunteer soldiers in Nelson's brigade, lost in the campaign of that brigade in Florida, and in its marches to and from Florida; which resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLSEY presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State in Congress to exert themselves to have compensation made to such persons as had their crops burned and their property destroyed by the United States troops south of Wale's line; which resolution was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TILLINGHAST submitted the following joint resolution; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

Whereas examinations and surveys have heretofore been made in the Narraganset bay, in Rhode Island, with a view to military and naval establishments, and reports have been made to the Navy Department, and communicated to Congress, containing evidence of the fitness and advantages of a place upon the waters of that bay for a naval depot:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy, as soon as may be, cause such further examinations and surveys to be made as are in his opinion necessary for ascertaining the fitness and the relative advantages or disadvantages of a place in the said Narraganset bay for a naval establishment, yard, and depot, on shore, and the best location thereof in said bay; with estimates of probable expense; and that said estimates, and the reports of said examinations and surveys, when made, and all such evidence as is now, or may then be, in possession of his Department, as to such fitness and advantages or disadvantages, be by the said Secretary communicated to Congress as soon as may be, with such views and opinions as he may deem important.

Resolved, further, That for carrying this resolution into effect, there be now appropriated, and there is hereby appropriated, the sum of $1,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the public lands belonging to the United States is a remainder of a joint common stock, belonging to the people of the United States and Territories, that may and should be disposed of by Congress, among the rightful owners, by some equitable plan of distribution.

Resolved, That a select committee of this House, consisting of twenty-six members, one chosen from each State, be instructed to prepare and report to this House some plan for an equitable distribution of the public lands, or their proceeds, among the rightful owners.

Debate arising on these resolutions, they were laid over under the rule.

Mr. COLES moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House a statement showing the number of Indians annually removed from the eastern to the western side of the Mississippi from 1789 to 1838, inclusive; with the quantity of land annually purchased of the Indians; the sums of money annually paid to the Indians; and the quantity of land granted each year for common schools, roads and canals, colleges and universities, and to the States, public institutions, and individuals, during the same period.

The rule which requires this resolution to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, it was read, considered, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, of Virginia, the House, by consent, proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on the 8th of January instant, in relation to the mode of collecting and disbursing the public revenue; and said resolution being read, and modified by the mover, was agreed to by the House.

Mr. HUNTER of Virginia, Mr. McKAY, Mr. BRIGGS, Mr. ELMORE, Mr. OGLE, Mr. MOORE, Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Hampshire, and Mr. MARTIN, were appointed a committee in pursuance of said resolution.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted the following joint resolution for amending the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, shall form a part of the Constitution of the United States, anything therein to the contrary notwithstanding, to wit:

1. That from and after the adoption of this amendment, the term for which the then Senate of the United States shall have been elected shall cease; and the several States shall proceed to elect Senators to serve four years, and in all time thereafter to elect Senators to serve four years, and no longer, in the Senate of the United States; the elections to be made in the same manner as is now prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

2. That upon the first meeting of the Senate under an election in pursuance of the foregoing amendment, the Senators shall be divided into two classes by lot; and the term of service of one class shall cease at the expiration of two years, so that a moiety of the Senate shall be elected every two years thereafter.

3. That the term of service of the President and Vice President of the United States shall be four years; and that the same individual shall not be elected to those offices respectively two terms in succession.

4. That the assent of the President of the United States to bills passed by the two branches of Congress be dispensed with.

5. That the power of the President of the United States to remove from office, and to fill vacancies thus created, is not a power conferred on him by the Constitution expressly, or by necessary construction of any power delegated to him by that instrument.

6. That the only provision made in the Constitution of the United States for removal from office is the process of impeachment, and that clause in that instrument which vests in Congress the authority to pass all laws necessary to carry into effect all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or any Department thereof. It shall therefore be required of Congress to provide for, and to regulate by law, all that concerns the removal from office, or the filling of vacancies in office which may happen during the recess of the Senate.

7. That all appointments to office, except such as may be otherwise directed by law, shall be made by the Senate, vice voce, on nomination by a member of that body.

8. That it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to commission all the officers to be appointed under the Government, whether civil, military, or naval; and to express in each commission the term of service of the officer, as the same shall be prescribed by law or the Constitution of the United States.

Ordered, That the said resolution be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a statement showing the amount of money expended annually by each Administration of the Government from the 4th of March, 1789, to the 4th of March, 1837, with the amount of public money lost annually by defalcations of public officers; designating what amount has been lost by collectors; and also the number of public officers annually in the employment of the United States under each of said Administrations, with the number who have embezzled the public money committed to their charge; showing, in like manner, the amount of public money lost annually by using banks as depositories, or receiving their notes in payment of public dues.

The said resolution was read, and the rule which requires the same to lie upon the table one day being dispensed with, it was considered and agreed to.

Mr. POTTS moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish this House with a tabular statement showing the quantity and description of iron, whether for railroads, steamboats, or for other purposes, which has been imported free of duty, or on which the duty has been remitted since the 1st day of January, 1832, together with the names of the person or persons importing the same, and the amount of the revenue which would have accrued to the Government had the duties been charged regularly thereon.

The resolution was read, and the rule which requires it to lie upon the table one day being dispensed with, it was considered and agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House any examination or survey that may have been made of the harbor of Marcus Hook, on the river Delaware, in the State of Pennsylvania, under the direction of the Chief Engineer; together with an estimate of the sum of money necessary for repairing and improving said harbor.

The rule which requires this resolution to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, it was read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. AYCRIGG submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to cause to be laid before this House seven hundred and fifty copies of the chart of Newark bay, and of the sand-bars in the vicinity of said bay, recently surveyed by Lieutenant Gedney.

The rule which requires this resolution to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, it was read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to furnish this House with a statement of the contracts entered into by the engineer superintending the improvements of Little Egg harbor, under the several appropriations made for that purpose; also, copies of said engineer's accounts, with a tabular statement of the quantity and kind of the materials (and the prices of the same) used in the work, together with the names of the persons to whom any part of said appropriations have been paid, and the amounts paid to them respectively; and also, that the Secretary of War inform the House of the mode of improvement adopted by said engineer, and wherein it differs from the mode originally proposed for the improvement of said harbor, as well in the cost and permanency of the same as in the manner of construction; and whether the partial destruction of the improvements by storms, and the cost of the same beyond the original estimate, are not owing in a great measure to the departure of the said engineer from the plan of improvement originally proposed; or, if not, to what cause the same may be attributed.

The rule which requires this resolution to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, it was read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. PECK offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House whether the annuities due the Seneca Indians in the years 1837 and 1838 have been paid; and if so, at what time and in what manner, and by whom the same were paid; and whether any goods have been paid or offered to be paid to said Indians on account of any such annuity; and if so, by what authority the same were paid or offered to be paid; and if the said annuities, or any portion thereof, remain unpaid, or were not paid at the time when the same became due, the reason why the payment thereof was delayed; and also to communicate to this House copies of all correspondence in relation to the same since the 19th day of March last.

Resolved, That he also furnish this House with a detailed statement of the "expenses of the delegation of Senecas of New York opposed to the treaty," amounting to $789 23; and the "expenses of the delegation of Indians in favor of the treaty," amounting to $9,500; and the "expenses of submitting the treaty to the several bands of New York Indians," amounting to $4,000; and also the "expenses of certain Indian delegations," amounting to $2,630, as contained in the report from the Indian department accompanying the President's message, particularly specifying in each case the names of the persons to whom the money was paid, the amount to each, the time when paid, and the services or other thing for which paid.

The rule which required these resolutions to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, they were read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. LOOMIS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to the House of Representatives, at the commencement of the first session of the next Congress, a modification of the present rates of postage, to take effect at such future time as may be expedient, having reference—

1. To the greatest amount of benefit to be attained at the least expense.

2. To the relative proportion and difference which ought to exist between the rates of postage on manuscript parcels and printed parcels.

3. To the equalization of the rates of postage on printed and on manuscript parcels, each with reference to its own class, and in proportion to the entire expense of the care and transmission of the same.

The rule which requires this resolution to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, it was read, considered, and agreed to:

Mr. HALL moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House what amount of claims has been adjusted and paid under the provisions of the third section of the act of July 5, 1832, for liquidating and paying certain claims of the State of Virginia, during each of the fiscal years since the passage of said act; what rule of evidence and principles of action have been adopted by the Department in adjusting such claims; whether judgments obtained by the claimants in the courts of Virginia are, or have been, received by the Department as evidence of the validity of such claims; and, if so, what rule or order of the Department, what amount of such judgments have been paid, and on what species and character of evidence, and on what rules and principles the said courts proceed in adjudicating such claims. And that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House what amount of scrip has been issued, under the provisions of the act of May 30, 1830, for satisfying Virginia bounty land warrants; what quantity, in acres, of such warrants presented at the Treasury before the 1st day of September, 1835, and what quantity, presented since that day, remain unsatisfied; whether any spurious or fraudulent warrants have been presented at the Treasury, and of what kind and character; and whether any, and what amount of, scrip is known or believed to have been issued upon such spurious or fraudulent warrants. And that he also communicate any information in his possession, showing under what acts and resolutions of the State of Virginia, and on what species and character of evidences, and on what rules and principles, the executive officers of that State have granted the land warrants, for the satisfaction of which provision is made in the act aforesaid.

The resolution was read, and the rule which requires the same to lie on the table being dispensed with, it was considered and agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of all the allowances made prior to the 30th of June, 1834, as an annual compensation for the services of superintendents of Indian affairs who were such in virtue of holding the office of Governor or secretary of any of the Territories of the United States, exhibiting the name of the person to whom made, his office, (whether Governor or secretary,) the name of the Territory, the period for which the allowance was made, the rate per annum, and the amount allowed to each; and also to state under what law or regulation such allowances were made.

The resolution was read; and, the rule which requires the same to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, it was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. INGHAM moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to this House a copy of so much of "Hassler's Survey" as relates to the harbor of New Haven, Connecticut.

On motion of Mr. HALEY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of Dr. Thomas Cot, for arrears on short pay as surgeon's mate, while stationed at Fort Trumbull, in New London, Connecticut.

On motion of Mr. REED, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement showing the amount of money received yearly for five years past, by each of the collectors of customs of the United States and others, on account of fines and forfeitures; and that he also inform this House whether any compromises have been effected during the said period after seizures made, and if so, by whom, and upon what condition.

On motion of Mr. REED, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House the amount of money received as fees, or in any other way, by any officer of the Government, or other person in the custom-house or its employment, each year for five years past, which has not been recorded in the Blue Book.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, of Massachusetts, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act passed in 1836, in addition to former acts, so as to make provision for the widows and children of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution who died or were wounded in the service.

On motion of Mr. SALTONSTALL, it was

Resolved, That the report and plan of the survey of the harbor of Lynn, Massachusetts, with an estimate of the cost of the improvements of the same, communicated to the House of Representatives by the Secretary of War on the 9th day of March last, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Commerce; and that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the said improvements.

Mr. EVANS submitted a joint resolution for the relief of John Morrison, acting lieutenant in the battle on Lake Champlain during the late war; which resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. NOYES, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill making an appropriation for perfecting a road required for use as a military road along the northeastern frontier of the United States, from the town of Eastport to the town of Houlton, both in the State of Maine, as recommended in the report of General John E. Wool and Major James D. Graham, of the United States Army, made to the Department of War on the 29th of December, 1838.

Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed to inform this House who are employed at this time by the Federal Government as printers to publish the laws of the United States, in the State of North Carolina, and what compensation they each receive in payment for their services.

The rule which requires this resolution to lie on the table one day being dispensed with, it was read, considered, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WORD, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House, at as early a day as convenient, what number of Choctaw claims for reservations under the fourteenth article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek has been examined by the board of commissioners under the act of 3d March, 1837; what number of applications has been made for examination, and not yet examined; and also all information in the possession of the Department relating to the claims of the Choctaws, under the article of the treaty above named, together with all information touching the contingent locations made by George W. Martin, and the instructions or authority under which said locations were made.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, it was

Resolved, That the select committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill providing for the division of the public domain, on the following principles: That, hereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause separate accounts to be kept of all moneys paid into the Treasury on account of sales of the public lands. That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to ascertain the quantity of public lands heretofore granted to or bestowed on the States, or any of them, for education, internal improvement, or other State or local purposes; and having ascertained the value thereof, computing the same at an average price of — per acre, and adding thereto the sums arising from proceeds of sales of the said lands granted to or bestowed on them for similar purposes, shall, on —, and thereafter semi-annually, on the 1st day of January and July in every year, divide the proceeds arising from sales of said lands among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of the Federal numbers, as ascertained by the census next preceding such division, making the first apportionment among those States which have not received any part or a proportionate part of the ratio aforesaid, until each shall have received its due proportion; and all subsequent apportionments among all the States according to the said ratio: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands to meet the expenditures of the Government for any year in which the receipts from customs or other sources of revenue shall be estimated to fall below — million dollars, and when it shall be deemed proper on that account to apply the said proceeds by special appropriation to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government: Provided, also, That in the event of war between the United States and any foreign Power, the said semi-annual division shall cease and be suspended during the continuance of such war.

And then the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 15, 1839.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of A. D. Ostrander for arrearage of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. T. also presented a petition from Alfred Vail and others, praying permission to import free of duty the materials for constructing the American electro-magnetic telegraph; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Susan Trigg, and the petitions of L. R. Lyon and D. S. Howard; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of Bradbury T. Gypson, reported the same without amendment; and, on motion of Mr. W., the bill was then taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of Henry Eckford, deceased, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the petition of Ira Day, of Vermont, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of Andrew Armstrong, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Claims, to which the following bills had been referred, reported them severally without amendment, recommending their passage:

- A bill for the relief of William Bennett;
- A bill for the relief of David McNair;
- A bill for the relief of Jacob Hands; and
- A bill for the relief of Samuel Ferguson.

Mr. TIPTON, from the same committee, to which the following bills had been referred, reported them severally without amendment, recommending their rejection:

- A bill for the relief of Dennis Quinlivan; and
- A bill for the relief of Alfred Westfall.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings, reported a bill providing for the erection of a fire proof building for the use of the Post Office Department; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. F., from the same committee, to which had been referred the joint resolution authorizing an examination of the claims of the workmen employed on the public buildings, reported the same without amendment; and, on motion of Mr. F., the same was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. YOUNG, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Elliott, of Ohio.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MOUTON, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to confirm certain land claims in the Greensburgh land district, in the State of Louisiana; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS AGREED TO.

The reports of the Committee on Pensions, unfavorable to the petitions of Amasa Brown and John R. Midwinter, were severally considered and concurred in.

The report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, unfavorable to the petition of William A. Crocker, was also considered, and agreed to.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing and requiring the registers and receivers of the United States land offices, in their offices respectively, to administer oaths in all cases where, by law or the regulation of the Treasury or Land Office Department, affidavits are required to be made previous to the purchase or entry of any tract of land, without any fee or extra compensation for such service.

COURT IN THE DISTRICT.

The Senate took up and considered, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia;" and, after some remarks from Messrs. ROANE and BAYARD,

Mr. WHITE moved to strike out the eleventh section, which increases the salary of the judge from $2,000 to $2,700. This amendment was supported by Messrs. WHITE, NILES, and CLAY of Alabama; and opposed by Messrs. ROANE and BAYARD.

On taking the question, Mr. WHITE's motion was adopted—yeas 28, nays 16.

Mr. MORRIS called the attention of the committee to that clause of the bill which provides that one of the associate judges of the circuit court shall preside in the criminal court in the absence of its judge; and moved to amend the bill by striking it out.

After some remarks from Messrs. ROANE, BAYARD, and MORRIS,

Mr. WALKER observed that, as a debate was likely to grow out of the question raised, he would move to lay the bill on the table, for the purpose of taking up the land bill.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to provide for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. MORRIS.

After some remarks from Mr. WALKER, Mr. MORRIS withdrew his amendment, with the consent of the Senate, and offered another amendment to the bill, providing that when the public lands in any of the new States shall be so far sold out that there shall remain the quantity of two million acres, that then the same shall be ceded to such State in absolute property, to be disposed of in such manner and upon such terms as the authorities of such State may direct.

After a debate, in which Messrs. MORRIS, SOUTHARD, and ALLEN took part,

Mr. BAYARD moved that the Senate adjourn; which motion was rejected—yeas 23, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, and White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—25.

After a debate, in which Messrs. LYON and SOUTHARD took part,

The question was taken on Mr. MORRIS's amendment, and it was rejected—yeas 14, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, Morris, Mouton, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, White, Williams of Mississippi, and Young—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Williams of Maine, and Wright—34.

Mr. RUGGLES then moved that the Senate adjourn; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, White, and Williams of Maine—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—26.

Mr. TALLMADGE then moved an adjournment; which was carried—yeas 25, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, White, and Williams of Maine—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—23.

And so the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 15, 1839.

Reports from standing committees being called for—

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to a construction of the revenue laws, and that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and be printed. Mr. C. made the motion because the latter committee had had charge of the subject in 1828, 1833, and 1834.

Mr. ADAMS remarked that the gentleman was mistaken in the latter assertion, for the subject had been taken away from the Committee on Manufactures, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. He therefore hoped this committee would not now be relieved of the duty which properly belonged to them.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he was unfortunate enough never to be able to satisfy the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures. Those who had been long in that House knew with what avidity the gentleman always insisted upon having this subject referred to the committee of which he [Mr. A.] was chairman. Mr. C. had, therefore, really thought that when he made the motion, if any gentleman would be gratified, it would be that gentleman, who had been for seven years struggling to have everything on the subject of the tariff sent to his committee. Mr. C. congratulated the country, however, that the gentleman had at last discovered that the tariff should be a revenue measure, and not a measure of protection. Mr. C. had always contended that the subject was one that constitutionally belonged to the Committee of Ways and Means, but the gentleman had always opposed it. He was glad the gentleman had changed his ground, and on that account Mr. C. withdrew his motion of reference, and merely moved the printing of the document; which was agreed to.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of James Maglemon.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of John Newton.

Mr. WORD, from the same committee, reported a bill to confirm the purchases of certain lands in the State of Mississippi, under the act of 9th of June, 1834.

Mr. LOOMIS, from the same committee, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill to change the location of the office of surveyor general of the district composed of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan.

Mr. L. also reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Jean B. Valle.

Mr. L. also reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury prepare and report to this House, as soon as may be conveniently done:

1. Statements showing the whole amount of public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, the amount surveyed, the amount granted for bounties and public services, the amount ceded to the States and Territories, and granted and reserved for the purposes of education, for roads and canals, and all other special and local objects, and the amount sold.

2. The entire cost to the Government of all the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and of the care and sale of the same, as near as the same can be ascertained and estimated, including the pay and compensation and expenses to the Government of all persons employed.

3. The amount paid, and obligated to be paid, for the extinguishment of Indian titles, accounting annuities at such sums as invested at five per cent would produce them, and excluding the purchase-money for cessions from foreign Governments, and the expense of Indian wars, and the like amount, including the purchase-money paid for the acquisition of lands and territories from foreign Governments; the quantity of lands that have remained unsold by the latest returns, after having been in market for the space of each of the periods—five years, ten years, fifteen years, and twenty years; and the quantity sold after having been in market for each of the same periods, and the quantity thrown into market each year, and the quantity sold during each year.

Mr. L. moved its present consideration; which was agreed to; and the question being on its adoption,

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, saw no necessity for it, as all the information, if not in an embodied form, had been already furnished to the House.

Mr. LOOMIS replied that there were many points of information embraced in the resolution which were not before the House.

Mr. YELL moved to strike out the third branch of the inquiry, relating to lands sold which had been in market from five to twenty years, &c.

Mr. LOOMIS said no return had ever been made of the amount of lands sold after those periods.

Mr. HARLAN expressed his conviction that the Senate and House documents would furnish all the information called for.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was in favor of embodying the whole of these returns in one document, so that the people might see at a glance the actual condition of the public domain.

Mr. MURRAY was also in favor of the proposed inquiry.

Mr. YELL's amendment was rejected; and the resolution was concurred in—ayes ninety-six, noes not counted.

Mr. TURNEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill to amend an act entitled "An act to require the judge of the district courts of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State," approved June 18, 1838.

The amendment, on Mr. T.'s motion, was concurred in; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, reported back the House bill, recommitting to that committee, to reorganize the district courts of the United States in the State of Alabama, with sundry amendments; all of which were concurred in.

Mr. CHAPMAN submitted some further amendments, which he supported with much earnestness, and they were opposed by Mr. LYON.

Mr. THOMAS moved to postpone the bill till Friday morning.

Mr. MARTIN moved to recommit it to the Judiciary Committee; whereupon

Mr. THOMAS withdrew his motion.

The motion of Mr. MARTIN to recommit, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, the communication of the Commissioner of Patents; sent in yesterday, was referred to the Committee on Patents.

The orders of the day being called for,

Mr. CAMBRELENG said it had been his intention, pursuant to the notice he had given, to ask the House to take up the appropriation bills to-day; but, in the hope that the House would finish the defalcation case, he would waive his intended motion.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Sundry executive communications were presented by the Chair, and laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, on leave, laid on the table a substitute he intended to submit to the Independent Treasury bill; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOON, on leave, presented sundry petitions.

DEFALCATION OF SWARTWOUT.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution to raise a select committee of nine, to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout and William H. Price; the question pending being on the motion to strike from the proposition that part of it proposing to raise the committee by ballot, and insert "viva voce."

Mr. LEGARE, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at length in opposition to the appointment of the committee by the Chair.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. CUSHMAN, CAMBRELENG, WISE, HOFFMAN, THOMAS, MENEFEE, and PRENTISS of Mississippi; after which,

Mr. UNDERWOOD having obtained the floor, spoke about half an hour, and then moved an adjournment; upon which motion

Mr. CAMBRELENG demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 16, 1839.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a copy of the survey of May river, from Tybee to Hunt river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the President of the United States, in relation to the percentage allowed to disbursing agents; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the President of the United States, in relation to the condition of the Seminole Indians who have emigrated; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of a number of citizens of Pittsburg, praying for an appropriation for improving the navigation of the Ohio river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Richard Graham and John O. Fallon, asking to be released from responsibility incurred as sureties.

Mr. MORRIS presented a paper from William Beck, of Cincinnati, who supposed that he had discovered a grand catholicism for all the diseases of the monetary system; which, after being read, was laid on the table.

Mr. MCKEAN presented the memorial of Henry C. Corbitt and two hundred and forty-one others, legal voters of Chestnut ward, in the city of Philadelphia. Also, the memorial of Samuel W. Picking, and fifty-nine men and ten women of Frankford, Pennsylvania, of similar purport, remonstrating against admitting any State into the Union with a constitution tolerating slavery, and requesting Congress to reject all propositions for the annexation of Texas to this Union.

The motion of reception was, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALL presented the remonstrance of citizens of Gloucester county, New Jersey, against the admission of any State into the Union with a constitution tolerating slavery, and against the admission of Texas into the Union.

The question of reception was, on motion of Mr. ROANE, laid on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the banks in the District of Columbia, was referred, made a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. N. also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill relating to the manner in which certain laws of the District of Columbia shall be executed; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which the subject had been referred, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Mayor of Washington to execute deeds to certain citizens of Washington; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Malachi Hagan, of the Territory of Florida; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill in relation to certain railways in the State of Mississippi; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Also, a bill granting to the State of Michigan one hundred thousand acres of land, to aid said State in constructing a canal around the falls of Ste. Marie; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Also, the bill for the relief of Henry Marsh, without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, in favor of granting a tract of land to each of the colleges in that State, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of John Roberts, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Charles S. Hempstead; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of John Campbell White, of Baltimore, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the petition of a number of citizens of Ohio in favor of the incorporation of a National Bank, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to allow a drawback on imported hemp, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the inquiry as to the expediency of remunerating Lieutenant J. B. Thornton, for losses sustained by the wreck of the Pulaski, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred the petition of the heirs of Abraham White, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs the report of the Secretary of War, (Doc. No. 58,) in reply to the resolution of the Senate, adopted on the 2d instant, calling for information as to the time when the claims of the volunteers of Alabama, for horses lost in the service of the United States, in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians, will be examined and settled; and what further, if any, provisions are necessary to a prompt and just settlement of said claims.

Mr. C. also offered the following resolution on the same subject:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision by law for the more prompt adjustment and payment of claims for horses lost in the service of the United States; and also into the expediency of removing the limitation fixed by the War Department on the value of horses lost in said service.

Mr. C. also remarked, in connection with the resolution, that he wished to call the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to so much of the document to be referred to the committee as related to restriction indicated by the last clause of his resolution. The Third Auditor, in his report to the Secretary of War, remarks:

"Your decision on the subject prohibits the allowance for any cavalry, or wagon horse, in cases in question, of more than one hundred and twenty dollars, the sum fixed on in your letter to General Jesup of the 2d December, 1837," &c.

Mr. C. remarked, that as regarded the Alabama volunteers, and probably most of those from other States, the operation of this restriction would be retrospective, and consequently unjust. He said he believed the Alabama volunteers had been mustered into service before the promulgation of this rule, and, of course, without any knowledge of its existence; and it would operate with extreme hardship on those who had carried into the public service horses of greater, or perhaps double the value, to be restricted to the sum of $120. It was (he said) with a view to prevent the unjust operation of the rules referred to that he had penned the last clause of the resolution he had submitted; and he hoped it would attract the special attention of the committee.

The resolution was then adopted nem con.

WORKMEN ON THE TREASURY.

Mr. BAYARD asked that the bill to amend the act establishing a criminal court in the District of Columbia might be taken up.

Mr. BENTON begged the Senator from Delaware to withdraw his motion a few minutes, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution from the House to pay the workmen on the public buildings.

Mr. BAYARD acceding to Mr. BENTON's request,

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives to investigate and settle the claims of the workmen on the public buildings in the city of Washington, was taken up.

Mr. MORRIS opposed the passage of the resolution, on the ground that it would be taking money from the Treasury without an appropriation by law.

Mr. KING and Mr. FULTON answered the objections, and the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and, by unanimous consent, was read the third time and passed.

COURT IN TENNESSEE.

The amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill to amend an act to require the judge of the district of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State, was considered and agreed to.

SMITHSONIAN LEGACY.

The amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution relative to the Smithsonian legacy, was laid on the table.

BRADBURY T. JEPSON.

The bill from the House for the relief of Bradbury T. Jepson was read the third time and passed.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

On motion of Mr. STRANGE, it was Ordered, That the report of the Commissioner of the Patent Office, made to the Senate on the 14th instant, be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands came up as the unfinished business; and, after a debate, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, BAYARD, ROBINSON, and CLAY of Kentucky, took part, the question was taken on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading, and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merriek, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, and Williams of Maine—22.

The Senate then went into executive session; after which it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 16, 1839.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked the consent of the House to take up the resolution submitted by him on Monday last, for an amendment to the rules, so as to substitute the viva voce mode of voting by the House, where it is now provided to be by ballot.

Mr. WISE objected.

Mr. DROMGOOLE thereupon moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WISE moved a call of the House.

Mr. PICKENS inquired if the mover of the resolution intended it to embrace the cases of election of President and Vice President?

Mr. DROMGOOLE replied that he had drafted the resolution expressly with regard to the rules of the House only, which were adopted by each Congress; and no such case as that referred to by the gentleman could come on this session.

Mr. ADAMS requested Mr. Wise to withdraw the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. WISE could not do so; for, on the adoption of a proposition of this kind, he wished it fully debated in a full House.

Mr. ADAMS appealed to Mr. DROMGOOLE to postpone the motion to some future day, as, if adopted, it would have an immediate effect upon another subject—the mode of appointing or electing the select committee on the Swartwout case.

Mr. DROMGOOLE could not consent to do so; the less so as the principle had already been settled by the House at the commencement of the present session.

A call of the House was then ordered, without a division, and proceeded in until the roll was called over a second time, when it was dispensed with.

The question then recurred on Mr. Dromgoole's motion to suspend the rules, and the yeas and nays were ordered on the call of the same gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER ruled the motion to be out of order, on the ground that the resolution was not before the House till the rules were suspended.

The question being then taken, resulted—yeas 97, nays 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, Deberry, De Graff, Dromgoole, Elmore, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, James Garland, Grantland, Gray, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Lewis, Logan, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parmenter, Paynter, Perukin, Phelps, Potter, John H. Prentiss, Reilly, Richardson, Rives, Robertson, Sheffer, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Stuart, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Weeks, Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Ayer, Bell, Bidle, Bond, William B. Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Cleatham, Childs, Clark, Clowney, Coffin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Graves, Grenuell, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, Menefee, Mercer, Mitchell, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogile, Peck, Ports, Pratt, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Sibbey, Slade, Smith, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—93.

So the rules were not suspended, requiring a majority of two thirds.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Sarah Angel and the other heirs-at-law of Benjamin King, deceased.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill entitled "An act to amend an act for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppressing insurrection, and repelling invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for this purpose, approved February 28, 1795."

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the settlement of the accounts of the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a joint resolution, explanatory of the act of the 3d of July, 1838, granting half pay and pension to certain widows, [providing that a subsequent marriage of the widow, or the death of her husband since the passage of the act, shall not bar her claim.]

The resolution having been read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole, Mr. W. asked its present consideration; but it being objected to, Mr. W. gave notice that he would move to take it up the first convenient opportunity.

Mr. FRY, from the same committee, reported bills granting pensions to Benjamin Price, William Harper, and Mary Uptegraft.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Konrad Widrig.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Martin Hooper and Charles Grisley.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John Wheeler.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the select committee on the subject of steam engines, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That two communications from the Secretary of the Treasury to the committee on steam engines, and the accompanying papers, the petition of the citizens of Pittsburg in behalf of Cadwallader's invention, and the petition of owners of steamboats at Louisville, be printed.

Mr. SERGEANT submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to.

Resolved, That ten thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on steam engines, and of the two communications from the said Secretary this day ordered to be printed, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, from the select committee on the subject, reported a bill to repeal the second section of the act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, approved July 7, 1838.

Mr. M. moved the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved its commitment; which was lost.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-day.

Mr. TOUCEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John M. Seran.

Mr. CORWIN, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Benjamin Heart.

Mr. DEBERRY, from the Committee on Agriculture, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Andrew Logan, of Iowa Territory.

Mr. PARKER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Robert Johnson, administrator of L. Roy.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported unfavorably on the memorial of Charles W. Dalney.

On motion of Mr. LEGARE, the Committee on Foreign Affairs was discharged from the memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts upon the subjects of war and peace.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Jane Vreeland, Nehemiah Phillips, and Catharine Rhodes, of Savannah, Georgia.

Mr. CHILDS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Paoli Wills, Patience Smith, James Thompson, Susannah Lilley, Mary Wilman, and Colonel William Lawrence.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of David Goodrich, Abijah Hitchcock, Sylvanus Wood, heirs of Benjamin Chappell, Cornelius Phillips, Edmund Price, heirs of Daniel Starr, and Elisha Dillingham.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Benjamin Bibben.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petitions of Betsey Warner, Elias Carpenter, James Taylor, and Samuel Butler.

Mr. ALLAN, of Vermont, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Aden Bartlet and David Bartlet.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Petitions, on leave, were presented by Messrs. CUSHMAN and SPENCER.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions from the Legislature of North Carolina on the subject of the public lands; which, on his motion, were read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the general committee of twenty-six on the public lands.

DEFALCATION OF SWARTWOUT.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution to raise a select committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, as stated in the proceedings of yesterday.

The debate was continued by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, FRY, MARTIN, BIDDLE, TOUCEY, and DUNCAN. The latter gentleman, after having discussed the proposition before the House at some length, gave way to Mr. BOON, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BOON then withdrew the motion for adjournment.

Mr. TURNEY renewed the motion to adjourn; upon which the yeas and nays were ordered; and were—yeas 92, nays 78.

The House accordingly adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 17, 1839.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the War Department, containing statements showing the contracts entered into by that Department during the year 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT communicated reports from the Executive Departments, as follows; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

A communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, inclosing reports of the Surveyors General of Illinois and Missouri, which were not received in time to be included in the annual report of that bureau.

A report from the Secretary of War, inclosing a statement from the Indian Bureau, showing the number of persons employed in that branch of the public service.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with the resolution of the 10th instant, showing the amount that would have been distributed up to June, 1839, under the bill to provide for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, which passed both Houses and was vetoed by President Jackson.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. LYON presented the petition of Joseph Campan, asking for a patent for a certain tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the petition of Ezekiel Rodgers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BENTON submitted a document prepared by General Hernandez, relative to the bill for the armed occupation of Florida.

Mr. BAYARD presented the petition of sundry inhabitants from New Castle county, Delaware, praying for an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at Delaware city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SWIFT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy, of Arkansas; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which the same had been referred, reported the bill from the House for the relief of Smith & Towns, without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Henry J. Pickering, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The report of the Committee on Pensions unfavorable to the petition of the heirs of Abraham White, was considered and concurred in.

NOTICE OF A RESOLUTION.

Mr. NORVELL gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a joint resolution providing for the purchase of the island at the confluence of the St. Peters and Mississippi rivers.

COURT IN THE DISTRICT.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate took up and considered, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend the act to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia; and, after some remarks from Mr. B., the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to provide for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands came up on its third reading.

Messrs. CLAY, CALHOUN, BUCHANAN, NILES, BENTON, and KING addressed the Senate; and the question on the passage of the bill being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merriek, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, and Williams of Maine—22.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 17, 1839.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John —.

Mr. CONNOR, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported, without amendment, Senate bill regulating the transportation of the mail by railroads; which was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported, with a recommendation that it do not pass, Senate bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Thomas Ripley; and said bill was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a bill to authorize Isaac Gage, of Augusta, in the State of Maine, to import, free of duty, the iron materials for the construction of steam vessels to be used in the coasting trade.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the widow of John Marshall.

Also, a bill for the relief of Dr. J. M. Foltz.

Also, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of building five brigs or schooners for the public service, the same having been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HOWARD submitted an amendment proposing to extend the inquiry to the expediency of constructing one or more steam revenue cutters; but he withdrew it on the suggestion of Mr. INGHAM that the subject was already before the Naval Committee.

Mr. PETRIKIN should like to know where was the use of adopting a resolution from the Naval Committee to instruct itself. If the object was considered by that committee to be a proper one, let them take the responsibility, and not relieve themselves by throwing it thus indirectly upon the House.

Mr. INGHAM replied that this was the inviolable usage of the House, at least ever since he had been a member of it, to instruct a committee on a subject which was not already before them. The committee could not report otherwise on this subject, because, though the object was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, his report had not yet been referred to the Naval Committee. Hence the committee was driven to adopt this course.

The resolution was then concurred in.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report upon the petition of William Kilgore; which was laid on the table.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Charles Whitcomb and James Gullison; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, the Committee on Manufactures was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Colegate and others, in relation to the duty on starch; and it was referred to the same Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to which was referred a bill upon the same subject.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The following message from the President of the United States was laid before the House by the Speaker:

To the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a communication from the Secretary of War, which is accompanied by one from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, suggesting the propriety of setting apart a tract of country west of the Mississippi for the Seminole Indians, so that they may be separate from the Creeks; and representing the necessity of a small appropriation for supplying the immediate wants of those who have been removed; and I respectfully recommend these subjects to the early consideration and favorable action of Congress.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, January 16, 1839.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting information called for by the resolution of the 31st December ultimo, in relation to the distribution of arms to the militia of the United States, under the act of April 23, 1808; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the contracts made by the various officers of the War Department on behalf of the United States, in the year 1838; which letter and statements were laid on the table.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of State of Vermont, inclosing the credentials of the Vermont delegation for the Twenty-Sixth Congress of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CASEY presented to the House certain documents from the Secretary of War in relation to an application which had been made to Congress by J. B. Beaubien and his associates, for his confirmation of their claim to the military reservation at Fort Dearborn, adjoining the city of Chicago, on Lake Michigan; which, on his motion, was ordered to be printed and laid on the table.

PETER MOORE AND COMPANY.

Mr. HUBLEY asked the consent of the House to take up and consider the bill for the relief of Peter Moore and Co. and others; which was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

CONGRESS OF NATIONS.

Mr. LEGARE said, that, yesterday, in making the report upon the memorial of certain citizens of Massachusetts, praying for a congress of nations for the settlement of national disputes, he had neglected to make the motion that the same be printed. He would beg leave now to make that motion.

Mr. HOWARD suggested the following amendment:

For reasons stated in the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made to the House on 13th June, 1838, and numbered nine hundred and seventy nine, in the printed documents of the second session of the Twenty-Fifth Congress.

Mr. ADAMS suggested the propriety of amending the motion so as to include the memorial which he presented last year, forming the basis of this report, and also those presented since. These memorialists seem to be well acquainted with the report made by the gentleman at the last session.

Mr. LEGARE had no objection to this amendment.

Mr. ADAMS said he presumed the committee had not looked into the memorial which discusses the report made by that committee at the last session. It was the most luminous of all presented them. He hoped the present report would be recommitted to that committee to take into consideration these memorials. He had many upon the same subject which had not yet been presented, from enlightened citizens from various parts of the Union.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to print was a distinct one from that of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It would not, therefore, be in order to amend that motion by moving to recommit the report; but a motion to recommit and print would be in order.

Mr. ADAMS so modified his motion.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. ADAMS and LEGARE in relation to the memorials presented, and the report of the committee of the last session upon this subject.

Mr. HOWARD said there were two classes of memorials before the committee; one class relating to the creating of a congress of nations, to settle national difficulties generally, and the other asking the interposition of the United States between the Republic of Mexico and the French nation. The latter class the committee now had under consideration, and, he hoped, would be prepared in a few days to make a report thereupon. The former, proposing a congress of nations, had been fully considered and reported upon by that committee at the last session. No new matter on the former point had been brought before them in these memorials, which they did not touch upon at that time; and it was for that reason that the committee asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. He had no objection to vote for printing the memorial also. Mr. H. was understood to say that the report had been founded upon one memorial.

Mr. ADAMS rejoined, that as this report had been founded upon but one single memorial, he considered it an additional reason why it should be recommitted. He considered the report made by that committee at the last session, one of the ablest that had ever been produced upon that subject, and would be willing to vote for printing one million copies to disseminate among the people.

Some further conversation here took place between Messrs. LEGARE, CUSHING, and ADAMS.

Mr. PETRIKIN, having obtained the floor, moved the previous question; but subsequently withdrew it for an explanation from

Mr. ADAMS, who said, as he felt himself satisfied by the explanations of the gentlemen of the committee, he would withdraw his motion to recommit, but insist on that to print the memorial.

Mr. PETRIKIN here renewed his motion for the previous question; which was seconded—yeas 68, nays 57.

The main question was then ordered—being upon the motion of Mr. LEGARE to print the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made on yesterday—and decided in the affirmative.

IMPORTS, ETC.

Mr. ELMORE asked leave of the House to take up the resolution submitted by him on the 8th of January, calling for information from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of imports, exports, and duties; which was agreed to, and the resolution adopted.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. TILLINGHAST gave notice that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to allow a drawback on duties on imported hemp, when manufactured into cordage and exported.

DEFALCATION OF SWARTWOUT.

The House then resumed the consideration of Mr. CAMBRELENG's motion to raise a select committee to investigate the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout; the question being on the motion to strike from the modified resolution the proposition to raise said committee by ballot.

Mr. DUNCAN addressed the House at some length; and having concluded his remarks,

Mr. PETRIKIN obtained the floor, and moved the previous question.

Mr. GRENNELL moved a call of the House; before taking the question, however,

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew the motion for the previous question, at the solicitation of Mr. STANLY, who, having spoken some time in reply to Mr. DUNCAN, renewed the motion for the previous question.

Mr. WISE inquired what would be the effect of the motion for the previous question, if it prevailed? Would it cut off the amendment which proposed the appointment of the committee by ballot?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WISE moved a call of the House.

The question was taken by tellers; and there appeared—yeas 91, noes 90.

The SPEAKER voted against it, and consequently it was lost.

Mr. KENNEDY obtained the floor, and moved that the House adjourn; upon which motion

Mr. COFFIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there appeared—yeas 14, nays 193.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, renewed the motion for a call of the House.

The question was taken by tellers; and there appeared—yeas 99, noes 101.

So the motion was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred upon the motion for the previous question.

The question was taken by tellers; and there appeared—yeas 94, noes 118.

So the motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. KENNEDY, being entitled to the floor, proceeded to discuss, for a short time, the proposition before the House; but waived his right to admit a motion for adjournment.

The question upon the motion to adjourn was then taken; and decided in the negative—yeas 83, nays 113.

Mr. KENNEDY intimated a wish that the House should come to a decision upon the subject before it; and to enable it to do so suspended all further remarks.

The question being on the proposition of Mr. THOMAS, to strike from the amendment moved by Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, the words "elect by ballot," and insert the words "viva voce,"

Mr. FILLMORE thereon demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH inquired of the Chair if the amendment to the amendment would not, as involving a change of the rules, require a majority of two thirds for its adoption?

The SPEAKER was understood to say that, if the amendment to the amendment required two thirds, it would also require two thirds to adopt the resolution. He decided that it was competent for a majority to amend the resolution; but as it involved a change of the rules, it would require a vote of two thirds to pass it; and cited precedents of the House and parliamentary law to sustain him in his decision.

Mr. WISE said he did not coincide with the opinion of the Speaker; that the law did not satisfy his mind. He contended that it was not competent for the Chair to entertain a motion which was, in effect, to change and abrogate the rules of the House, and stated his point of order to be founded upon the rules of the House, in the following words:

"All committees shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless otherwise specially directed by the House; in which case they shall be appointed by ballot."

The SPEAKER decided that it was in order to move the amendment, and that the point raised might be "a fit ground for its rejection by that House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress, as if it were against order;" that if the amendment to the amendment be agreed to by a majority, and the amendment as amended be incorporated into the resolution by a majority, the resolution, in that form, would require, under the 119th rule, which provides, "nor shall any rule be suspended except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present," a vote of two thirds to pass the same.

Mr. WISE appealed from this decision of the Chair, and demanded the yeas and nays upon said appeal.

Mr. ELMORE suggested to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] that this was not the time to raise the question of order; that it would be much better to raise it upon the resolution itself, and not on a preliminary motion.

Mr. WISE replied that it was the proper time; he wanted the House to determine whether it was competent to entertain a motion that, in his opinion, violated a rule of the House.

Mr. FILLMORE here read the rule of the House, which, in substance, says that a proposition to amend the rules should be submitted one day previous to the question on its action; and gave it as his opinion that it was not in order to entertain the motion to amend the resolution.

Mr. BANKS said he had risen for the purpose of sustaining the decision of the Chair, and should have preferred adhering to the course he had prescribed to himself in voting rather than in participating in the protracted and boundless debates of this House, and especially upon the resolutions and amendments now under consideration; but, concurring in the decision made by the Chair in the question of order now raised, and as an appeal had been taken from that decision to the House, he felt bound by every consideration of duty which he owed to himself and the privileges due to every member of the House, briefly to assign the reasons for the opinion he entertained. He regretted that, in the views he should present upon this subject, he should be compelled, by way of illustration, to allude to the practice of another legislative body, over whose deliberations he long had the honor of presiding.

Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. B.,) what is the question we are called upon to decide? Certain resolutions have been introduced proposing to raise a committee to investigate the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, late collector at the port of New York; a motion had been made by his colleague [Mr. Wise] to amend the resolutions so as to change the mode of appointing the committee, by inserting the words "by ballot;" and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Thomas] had moved to amend the amendment by substituting in lieu thereof, "viva voce." He asked whether it was in order to move to amend the amendment? There could be no doubt upon that point. It is a principle of parliamentary law recognized by every writer upon the subject, and practiced upon by every legislative body known to our history, that a further amendment at this time would not be in order. However inconsistent or incompatible an amendment may be to one already agreed to, or to the main question itself, it furnished proper ground for its rejection by the House; but it could not be suppressed by the Speaker. Suppose that the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland was in direct and palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States: could the Speaker say that it was out of order, and, therefore, not entertain the motion? Surely not, sir. Each member decides for himself what is constitutional or unconstitutional, expedient or inexpedient. The only question for the Speaker to decide, when a proposition is submitted, is, whether it is in order to amend. If that question be answered affirmatively, he has no right to decide upon the character or bearing of the proposition or amendment. If this amendment to the amendment should be adopted, and finally become incorporated with, and stand as a part of, the original resolution, then, by another rule of the House, it would require two thirds of the members present to pass the resolution, which he believed would be carried by nine tenths of the members of this body; for no member was opposed to this investigation. In the House of Delegates of Virginia everything is decided by a majority of the House; we know nothing of this two-thirds system. By a standing rule of that House, no committee, whether standing or select, shall be less than five, nor more than thirteen members; it had often happened there, upon great and general questions, affecting every portion of the State, that a resolution would be adopted directing the Speaker to take one member from each congressional or senatorial district; the standing rule, by the action of the House itself, would be, pro tanto, suspended or repealed; so the same principle would prevail here under the rules of this House. But, sir, you are doing every day in practice the identical principle involved in this amendment. He would not, however, recapitulate and comment upon the precedents and authorities brought to bear upon this question by the Speaker, and would not trespass longer upon the patience of the House, believing that action was more important than words.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, replied briefly to Mr. Banks, and in opposition to the decision of the Speaker, and contended that the adoption of the two-third principle, by entertaining the motion to incorporate in this resolution the words "viva voce," would be practicing a fraud upon the House.

The SPEAKER here made a further brief explanation in support of his decision.

Mr. HARLAN moved the previous question upon the appeal; which was seconded.

The main question being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. CAMBRELENG demanded the yeas and nays upon that question; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE thereupon withdrew his appeal.

Mr. CAMBRELENG so modified his original resolution as to accept the words "viva voce," in the place of "by ballot."

Mr. WISE inquired if the resolution, in this form, providing for the appointment of the committee viva voce, was in order?

The SPEAKER decided it to be in order; but that, if the resolution, in its modified form, be agreed to, it would operate as a suspension of the rules, and would require a "vote of at least two thirds of the members present" to pass the same; and that, if not passed by a vote of two thirds, the message of the President would remain the business before the House, subject to be referred to a committee to be appointed by ballot, or to any other disposition which the House might choose to make of it.

The resolution being modified by the mover to read, "appointed by the House viva voce," the amendment moved to the original resolution by Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, and the amendment moved thereto by Mr. THOMAS, fell.

Mr. MARVIN asked whether it would be in order so to amend the resolution, as modified, as to strike out the words "viva voce," and insert the words "by ballot?"

The SPEAKER decided that it would.

Mr. MARVIN then moved to amend the resolution accordingly.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 113, nays 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Doherty, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Legare, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Sampson Mason, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Pearce, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Riden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepherd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Southgate, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillaghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher L. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Alverton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beine, Bicknell, Birdsell, Boon, Bouldin, Brodiehead, Bronson, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Cray, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Hoyt, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClare, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrik, Phelps, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reily, Richardson, Rives, Sheffer, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Weeks, Whittlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—105.

So the amendment of Mr. MARVIN was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolutions; and upon that question,

Mr. KENNEDY demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The resolutions, as follows, were then agreed to:

Resolved, That the communication from the President of the United States, of the 8th of December, 1833, relating to the defalcation of the late collector of the port of New York, except so much as relates to a modification of the revenue laws, be referred to a select committee of nine members, to be appointed by the House by ballot, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the causes and extent of the late defalcations of the custom house at New York and other places; the length of time they have existed; the correctness of the returns which have been made by the collectors, naval and other officers, and the deposit banks, respectively; and all such facts connected with the said defalcations as may be deemed material to develop their true character.

Be it further resolved, That the said committee be required to inquire into, and make report of, any defalcations among the collectors, receivers, and disbursers of the public money, which may now exist; who are the defaulters; the amount of defalcations, the length of time they have existed, and the causes which led to them; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed a wish that the House would make it the order of the day for to-morrow to go into a ballot.

Mr. COFFIN moved that the House proceed immediately to ballot.

Mr. GRANT moved that the House adjourn; which was taken by tellers, and decided in the negative.

Mr. COFFIN's motion was then agreed to; and the House accordingly proceeded to ballot.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. DROMGOOLE, GARLAND of Virginia, and MARVIN, as tellers to count the ballots.

The following gentlemen having received the requisite number of votes, were declared duly elected to constitute the proper number of the committee: MESSRS. CUSHMAN, HOPKINS, and HUBLEY.

At ten o'clock a motion was made by Mr. DROMGOOLE that the House do adjourn; which motion was decided in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. DROMGOOLE that there be a call of the House, which was also decided in the negative; and then (at eleven o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 18, 1839.

Mr. STRANGE presented two sets of resolutions passed by the Legislature of North Carolina, one asking for an appropriation for opening the inlet at Nag's Head; the other on the subject of the public lands.

After some remarks from Messrs. STRANGE, WALKER, BROWN, DAVIS, and NILES, on the subject of the last resolutions, they were laid on the table.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of one hundred and twelve citizens of Gloucester county, New Jersey, praying for the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the question of reception was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the petition and papers of Matthew Arbuckle were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SEVIER presented the petition of fifty lawyers of Arkansas, in relation to the circuit and district courts for that State; which, after some remarks from Messrs. SEVIER, KING, BUCHANAN, WALKER, and CLAY of Alabama, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of Jacob Carter and others, citizens of Georgetown, District of Columbia, praying a retrocession of that part of the county of Washington west of Rock creek, to the State of Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company, setting forth the great advantages of said road, and praying for the passage of the bill pending in their favor; also, a memorial from sundry citizens of De Kalb county, Alabama, on the same subject; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. MOUTON presented several petitions from citizens of Louisiana, whose names were not heard, asking for confirmation of their land claims; all of which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PRESTON presented the memorial of Captain Hezekiah S. Thistle, of Louisiana, on the subject of the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the communication of the Secretary of War relative to the appointment of paymasters for the Indian department, reported a bill for that purpose; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. T., from the same committee, reported a bill providing for the appointment of additional clerks in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Sandford, deceased; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, reported bills for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Captain William Williams, deceased; for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Morris, deceased; and a bill for the relief of the heirs of Dr. William Ramsay, deceased; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of William Bayley, deceased.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Matthew Arbuckle; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Griffin, deceased; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of John Hawkins, the heirs of Henry Hamilton, and the heirs of E. K. Withers.

RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Mr. NORVELL, in pursuance of notice given, obtained leave and introduced a joint resolution providing for the purchase of the island at the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was taken up as the special order of the day.

Mr. TIPTON gave a brief explanation of the contents and objects of the bill. The appropriation being $450,000, that is $150,000 for that portion of the road in each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. HUBBARD, after a few observations, moved to strike out the word "fifty" wherever it occurs; thus reducing the appropriation for each State $50,000.

After some remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD, KING, and BROWN, in support of the motion, and from Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, and ROBINSON, in opposition to it, the question was taken; and Mr. HUBBARD's motion was adopted—yeas 27, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Swift, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, and Williams of Mississippi—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Kentucky, Fulton, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and Young—17.

Mr. KING, after a few remarks, moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; which, after some remarks from Mr. YOUNG in opposition to the motion, was carried—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, and Williams of Mississippi—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Kentucky, Cuthbert, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Wright, and Young—22.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Director of the Mint, showing the operations of that institution for the year 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of claims under the Florida treaty of 1819, recommending additional legislation; which was laid on the table.

Also, a message transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury on the propriety of changing the second section of the act of March, 1837, for the relief of the insolvent debtors of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. WALL, who voted with the majority, said he had been earnestly requested to move a reconsideration of the vote on striking out the enacting clause of the Cumberland road bill. He was willing to make this motion, as he was aware that there were several Senators absent when the vote was taken, to give an opportunity for a more full expression of the opinion of the Senate, though he had no intention of changing his own vote.

Mr. W's motion was supported by Messrs. BENTON, SMITH of Indiana, and MORRIS, and opposed by Messrs. PRESTON, CALHOUN, KING, and CLAY of Alabama.

Mr. KING moved to lay the motion on the table, giving notice that he himself would call it up at one o'clock on Monday, when he expected there would be a full Senate.

On taking the question, Mr. KING's motion was lost—yeas 23, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, and Williams of Mississippi—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Wright, and Young—26.

The question was next taken on the reconsideration of the vote on striking out the enacting clause; and the reconsideration was ordered without a division.

The question then recurring on striking out the enacting clause, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, and Williams of Mississippi—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Wright, and Young—26.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out all after the word "dollars," in the eleventh line, which provides that the same limitations and restrictions shall exist as are contained in former laws on the subject. On this motion a debate ensued, in which Messrs. HUBBARD, WALKER, CLAY of Kentucky, and CLAY of Alabama supported, and Messrs. TIPTON, YOUNG, BAYARD, and NILES opposed the motion.

Mr. HUBBARD then withdrew his motion.

Mr. WALKER moved to strike out that part of the bill which provides that the appropriation shall be reimbursed out of the two per cent. fund reserved for making roads to the States named in the bill, contending that this fund had been long exhausted, and that it could, by no possibility, ever produce the amount appropriated.

The motion was supported by Messrs. WALKER, CLAY of Alabama, and CLAY of Kentucky, and opposed by Messrs. KING, BAYARD, TIPTON, and BENTON; and on taking the question, the motion was lost—yeas 22, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Foster, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Swift, Walker, White, Williams of Maine, and Williams of Mississippi—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Tipton, Wall, Webster, Wright, and Young—24.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Wright, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, and Williams of Mississippi—23.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 18, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read, Mr. ELMORE rose, and preferred a request to the House to be excused from serving on the select committee raised last night on the defalcation of Swartwout and Price.

Mr. E. gave his reasons at length, which will be published hereafter; and his application was opposed by Messrs. BOULDIN, GRENNELL, DAWSON, WISE, PRENTISS of Mississippi, MERCER, REED, MENEFEE, and POPE, and sustained by Messrs. HAYNES and CRAIG.

The question was taken by yeas and nays; and there were—yeas 118, nays 95.

So Mr. ELMORE was excused.

Mr. CUSHMAN then preferred the same request.

The question was taken by yeas and nays; and there were—yeas 106, nays 99.

So Mr. CUSHMAN was excused.

Mr. HUBLEY also asked to be excused.

The request was opposed by Messrs. BIDDLE, JOHNSON of Maryland, WISE, and NAYLOR; and sustained by Messrs. POTTER and CRAIG.

The question was taken by yeas and nays; and there were—yeas 121, nays 68.

So Mr. HUBLEY was also excused.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked leave to submit a resolution authorizing the Speaker to fill up the three vacancies.

The SPEAKER pronounced it out of order, on the ground that the House having passed an existing order that the committee should be elected in a particular form, it would require a rescinding resolution before that form could be changed.

Mr. WISE then moved that the House proceed now to fill the three vacancies by ballot, further moving a call of the House, and demanding the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 104, nays 81.

So the motion was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CRARY expressed a wish that the members of the House would move some concert of action, and thereby save the time of the House; and, having that object in view, he would move to strike out the word "now" from the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise], and insert the words "will to-morrow proceed" to fill the three vacancies.

Mr. PETRIKIN inquired if a majority or a plurality of votes would be required to determine the ballot.

The SPEAKER decided that it would require, by the rules of the House, a majority on the first ballot, and on the second a plurality.

Mr. MENEFEE demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion for a call of the House; which were ordered.

Mr. CRARY then withdrew his amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion to proceed now to ballot, and decided in the affirmative.

The House accordingly proceeded to ballot.

Messrs. MARVIN, GARLAND of Virginia, and TOUCEY, were appointed tellers; and the following was the result of the first ballot: Number of votes given, 203; necessary to a choice, 102; of which—

No one having a majority, there was consequently no election.

Mr. HAYNES gave notice to the House that he could not consent to serve on this committee if he should be elected. He had made such a declaration before the House proceeded to ballot, when it was intimated to him by some gentlemen that he would be voted for. His duties on the several committees precluded his serving on this. He was, however, very thankful to the gentlemen whose kind dispositions had honored him with their votes.

Mr. TAYLOR also, on account of his duties on other committees, asked the House to decline voting for him as one of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of New York, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. PARKER moved a call of the House: lost.

Mr. TOUCEY moved that the House adjourn; and upon said motion, Mr. WISE demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 30, nays 106.

Mr. ADAMS said, as two gentlemen had declined serving on this committee, if elected, he would inquire of the Speaker whether it would not, on the second ballot, require a majority of votes to constitute an election?

The SPEAKER. The second ballot is not dependent on the first; and therefore any member, whether voted for on the first ballot or not, would on the second require but a plurality to insure his election.

Mr. POTTER, who had been voted for on the first ballot, objected to serving upon the committee. He stated that it would give him pleasure to do so, but his bad state of health would absolutely preclude him from giving any attention, were he to be elected, to the laborious duties which that committee would have to undergo in this investigation.

Mr. McKENNAN moved a call of the House, and demanded the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. DROMGOOLE thought it was useless thus to waste the time of the House, and suggested that the House would adjourn.

Mr. WISE having raised the question of order upon Mr. D.'s motion, the House not having transacted any business since the last motion to adjourn was disposed of,

Mr. DROMGOOLE withdrew his motion for an adjournment.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on Mr. McKENNAN's motion for a call, the House refused to order the same by a vote of 57 to 102.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved that the House adjourn; and upon said motion tellers were demanded. The House refused to adjourn by a vote of 63 to 90.

The House again proceeded to ballot, when it resulted as follows: Whole number of votes, 174; necessary to a choice, 73; of which—

Messrs. MARTIN, TAYLOR, and WAGENER were elected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved that the House adjourn; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. WISE, who said that, as the committee was now organized, he would ask leave of the House to submit a resolution authorizing the committee to appoint a clerk and printer, and grant them leave to sit during the sitting of Congress.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to its reception at this time.

Mr. WISE thereupon moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer it; and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Before the question was taken, however, Mr. JACKSON, of New York, moved that the House adjourn; which it refused to do by a vote of 67 to 72.

Mr. WAGENER here rose, and intimated a wish to the House to excuse him from serving on the committee; but was not permitted to proceed in his remarks.

The question then recurred on the motion to suspend the rules, which was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 83, nays 62; not being two thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. TAYLOR rose to ask to be excused from serving on the committee, and said he would prefer that the question on excusing be decided in a full House, and hoped the House would adjourn for that purpose.

Mr. BEATTY demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; which were not ordered.

The question was taken by tellers, and decided in the affirmative.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 19, 1839.

The first business in order being the request of Mr. TAYLOR, to be excused from serving on the select committee to which he had been elected last night, and the attendance being very thin,

Mr. GRAY moved a call of the House; which being ordered, was proceeded in for some time, when it was dispensed with—one hundred and sixty-one members having answered to their names.

Mr. TAYLOR then assigned his reasons at length why he wished to be excused from serving on the committee. The main one was that all the gentlemen of the anti-Administration party were distinguished lawyers, while Mr. T. was not a member of that profession.

Mr. GRAY sustained the motion, and insisted that it was but fair and proper that three distinguished lawyers on the other side should also be selected. He submitted this position to the justice of the gentleman from Virginia himself, [Mr. WISE,] and the Opposition generally.

Mr. SIBLEY inquired of his colleague, who was himself one of the most distinguished lawyers of his State, whether, if elected, he would consent to serve on the committee?

Mr. GRAY replied that there were twenty, at least, of the Administration party, either of whom would be acceptable, but he did not choose to respond to the interrogatory until the exigency should, if it ever did, arise.

Mr. WISE said he was willing to take the most efficient men of the party, whom he believed to be independent and conscientious gentlemen; but he would not select men to play the part of special pleaders and pettifoggers on that committee. Mr. W. was willing to take the gentleman himself.

Mr. GRAY did not desire it. He again appealed to Mr. WISE that, for his own sake, he having condemned the Secretary of the Treasury in advance, to prevent improper imputations, he should consent to place three strong men on the Administration side. Mr. G. denied any disposition, on the part of those with whom he acted to protract this discussion; for if only twelve Whigs had voted for the three voted for by the friends of the Administration, the committee might have been at work two days ago; while it was known that many of the latter had voted for the Whigs.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, quoted the article in the Globe to show that these excuses were but carrying out a concerted scheme to defeat the committee altogether, or have it composed of all Whigs.

Mr. P. contended that Mr. TAYLOR, as a member of the medical profession, was better qualified to serve on the committee than a lawyer, because they were to examine into the diseases of the body-politic, and apply the knife to its corruptions. He should not admit the gentleman's excuse.

Mr. THOMPSON said no better selection of Opposition men could have been made than they had done, and having also a majority, it was but common justice that the Administration party should have their own favorite men. They should have men accustomed to the examination of witnesses, accustomed to take part in the debates in that House, men in whom the Administration party themselves had confidence. This was nothing more than what was right and fair.

Mr. BOULDIN said he wished, as he had voted and should vote, apparently rather unreluctantly, in refusing to excuse his friends from sitting on this committee, to give his reasons for it. He said that it had been urged, very contrarily to his opinions and feelings, that to choose the committee by ballot was the best way. Mr. B. thought it was the worst. He wished it to be decided by the country, which was the best. He wished, without compliment or disparagement to either the Speaker, or to the House, or to the committee, or to any member of it, to have it seen by the country, by the frame of this committee, (looking only to the putting of it together,) whether it is better to have somebody responsible or nobody. The world would have understood the committee, and the frame of it, in every respect, and would have compared it with committees formed by the Speakers of this and other bodies when the Speaker had the appointment. He wished, principally, to say to his friends that, although he might seem unkind in refusing to excuse them from sitting on this committee, yet they would find him exceedingly soft in excusing them for not sitting, should they think proper not to attend.

The debate was further continued by Mr. MOORE for excusing, and Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, against it; when the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered, nem diss.

Mr. PETRIKIN obtaining the floor, demanded

Mr. GRENELL called for the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were 102 to 102—a tie; the Speaker voting in the affirmative, the question was carried.

So the request of Mr. TAYLOR to be excused was granted, and he was excused accordingly.

Mr. WAGENER then preferred a request to the House to excuse him from serving, stating his reasons therefor. He regretted exceedingly that he had been placed in a position that required him to ask this House to excuse him from the performance of the duties appertaining to the situation conferred upon him; at the same time he assured the House that this determination had not arisen from any desire in him to embarrass it. From the circumstances under which he had been elected, he was satisfied that he could have taken no other course than that he had adopted for himself. It would be recollected that after the three honorable gentlemen were excused yesterday, a ballot was taken, and at which ballot he was not a candidate. Three gentlemen of high legal attainments were generally supported by the friends of the Administration, and three others, friends of the Administration, and himself not of the number, were supported by those opposed to the Administration. On the second ballot, to his surprise, a new ticket was concocted by the Opposition, upon which his name was placed, and he was elected. Had he been aware of this arrangement before the ballot had proceeded, he should most assuredly have promptly and publicly declined. He asked why this change on the part of the Opposition? Why not adhere to their first ballot? Or why not, when they knew from the first ballot the inclination of the Administration party as to whom they desired, allow them to elect those individuals, or at least a majority of them? Was it magnanimous to refuse us this much? Was it exactly fair to elect others of the same party? If the Opposition cannot support those men whom the Administration party desire, let them then elect those of their own party. This would seem to him to have been the course that they should have pursued. He did not wish to be understood as dictating any particular course to those gentlemen, further than stating what he should have supposed would have been their proper course. And again: after they have put upon that committee, as now organized, four Whigs and two Conservatives, and all of them lawyers, too, and still refuse to give the Administration party their choice—under these circumstances, he could not do less than ask to be excused. He would ask of them but to extend the same courtesy to him as to others; if the House should not, he presumed he must, however reluctantly, submit to its mandates. Before he concluded, he would say one word more.

He did not wish to be understood as fearing a strict and thorough and searching investigation. No, he was one of those who, ever since charges had been alleged against the Secretary of the Treasury, had been anxious to meet them; and he trusted and felt they would be met in such manner as would exonerate the Secretary of the Treasury from any censure, misconduct, or neglect. From his partial knowledge of that gentleman, he could not believe that he was corrupt. He never, however, would shrink from any responsibility imposed upon him by this House, if done in what he considered an unexceptionable manner, nor should he fault at any time in the performance of his duty, having a single eye to his country's good, and to protect the innocent and expose the guilty.

Mr. WISE opposed the request, and was followed on the same side by Messrs. JENIFER and STANLY, who were replied to by Mr. BYNUM in a caustic speech of some length, which will be given hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, having obtained the floor, addressed the House in opposition to excusing Mr. WAGENER, and concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. BYNUM earnestly requested Mr. JOHNSON to withdraw the motion to enable him to reply to some remarks which fell from Mr. STANLY, but he refused.

Mr. PARKER moved a call of the House, but the motion was negatived.

The previous question was now seconded by the House, put, and carried, and the main question being on excusing Mr. WAGENER from serving on the committee,

Mr. WISE demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 102, nays 105.

So the House refused to excuse Mr. WAGENER.

Mr. MARTIN said he was not compelled to ask of the House to be excused from serving upon this committee, for he could avail himself of the rules of the House to do so. He had abundant reasons why he could not serve; but would content himself with stating that he was already a member of two committees of this House, the duties upon which occupied a considerable portion of his time; and that the great quantity of business confided to his charge by his constituents would preclude the possibility of his leaving the city to attend to the duties of this investigating committee without wholly neglecting that. He felt it peculiarly his duty, as this is the last session he should be a member of this House, to attend strictly to the duties which his constituents had assigned him. There was nothing which had been dictated upon this floor, or charged in the public prints, that could deter him from assuming the responsibilities that will be attendant upon a member of this committee, or that could cause him to shrink from any other responsibility that might be assigned him, if he thought it his duty to do so. He did not fear denunciation from any quarter; and, if a sense of justice to his constituents did not require him to devote all the time that is left of this session to their business, he would not lay himself liable to the charge of shrinking from any duty, however unpleasant it might be to his feelings. He was entitled by the rules to be excused, and would put it upon that ground, and excuse himself.

The SPEAKER then stated that there were two vacancies to be filled in the committee.

A motion was made that the House do now proceed to ballot for the vacancies on the committee; which was agreed to.

Mr. GRAY wished to offer a single suggestion; but he was called to order, the House having resolved now to go into the ballot.

Mr. HUNTER, of Ohio, said he had voted in the affirmative on the question of excusing Mr. WAGENER, and moved a reconsideration of the vote.

The SPEAKER said it was not yet in order to act on that motion.

The House thereupon proceeded to ballot for two members, to fill the remaining vacancies in the committee.

Mr. GARLAND reported the result; which was, that the total number of votes cast had been 201; necessary to a choice 101; of which—

Mr. Owens received	103
Mr. Foster	101
Mr. Hamer	90
Mr. Thomas	84

and many other gentlemen smaller numbers.

He also stated that on one ballot there had been three names. As the tellers had no means of ascertaining which two of the three to count, they had considered the ballot as blank.

The SPEAKER quoted the rule in relation to blank ballots, and pronounced their decision to be, in the opinion of the Chair, correct.

No objection was made to it in the House.

The SPEAKER thereupon declared Mr. FOSTER of New York, and Mr. OWENS of Georgia, to be duly elected.

Mr. HUNTER now renewed his motion to reconsider the vote by which Mr. WAGENER was not excused from serving.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved the previous question.

Mr. EVANS moved to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote; which motion took precedence by the rule.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to adjourn. Negatived.

Mr. WILLIAMS inquired whether, should the motion to lay on the table prevail, Mr. WAGENER would remain a member of the committee?

The SPEAKER decided that he would; but that the House might take up the question to reconsider at any time hereafter.

The SPEAKER having put the question,

Mr. DUNCAN moved a call of the House, and asked for the yeas and nays; but the House refused them.

Mr. DUNCAN moved that the question be taken by tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion for a call of the House was negatived without a count.

The question being again put to the House, Mr. DUNCAN asked for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 103, nays 66.

So the motion of Mr. HUNTER, to reconsider the vote refusing to excuse Mr. WAGENER, was laid on the table.

Mr. WISE asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee of nine, elected by this House to investigate the late defalcations of public officers, have power to elect a clerk, to employ a printer to print for its own use its journal and other papers required to be copied for its members; that the committee have leave to proceed to New York, or other places, for the purpose of prosecuting its inquiries; and that the members thereof be excused from attendance upon the House, until it shall have made its report.

Mr. BEATTY and Mr. HAYNES objected.

Mr. WISE moved to suspend the rules, to allow of the motion being offered.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BEATTY moved to adjourn.

Mr. MENEFEE demanded the yeas and nays, but withdrew the call.

The motion was negatived without a count.

The question recurring on the motion to suspend the rules,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 112, nays 32.

So the rules were suspended.

The above resolution was then again read.

Mr. HARLAN moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, put, and carried; and the main question being on agreeing to the resolution,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being put on the resolution,

A MEMBER moved a call of the House.

The motion was pronounced out of order, the previous question having been seconded.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a reconsideration of the vote, and a postponement of the question until Monday.

Mr. CUSHING demanded the previous question.

Mr. DUNCAN moved a call of the House; which was lost.

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his motion to reconsider, saying he would renew it on Monday.

Mr. WISE, to settle the matter now, moved to reconsider, and demanded the previous question.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a call of the House; which was lost.

The previous question was seconded, put, and carried; and the main question being on the reconsideration, it was negatived without a count.

So the House refused to reconsider the vote adopting Mr. Wise's resolution.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, suggesting the propriety of extending the provision of the insolvent law of March 2, 1837, to cases which may have occurred before the 1st of January, 1839.

Mr. SPENCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill for the construction of a free bridge over the Eastern Branch, reported the same without amendment.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. TALLMADGE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced joint resolutions for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States; which were read twice and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolutions; which lie one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate any information he may possess in relation to the banks or institutions exercising the banking privilege in the Territory of Wisconsin; whether they are exercising such privileges in pursuance, or in violation, of the laws of the United States, and whether their notes are received in payment for the public lands.

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to report a bill to disaffirm, disapprove, and render null and void any act of the Territorial Legislature creating banking institutions in Wisconsin Territory whose charters have not been approved by Congress, or where the provisions of their charters, or the acts of Congress approving them, have been violated.

Resolved, That the committee also report a bill to give jurisdiction to the courts of the Territories of the United States over all the banking institutions in said Territories, and to provide punishment for the violation of the act of Congress of the 1st of July, 1836, or of any other act that has been, or may hereafter be, passed approving bank charters.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any additional appropriation is necessary to enable the surveyor general of the States of Missouri and Illinois to complete the surveys of the public lands in the State of Illinois.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The report from the Committee on the District of Columbia, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate directing them to inquire whether the banks have acted in conformity to the provisions of their charters, and reporting that the banks have acted in conformity therewith, was taken up and agreed to.

PURCHASE OF AN ISLAND.

The joint resolution for the purchase of an island at the confluence of the St. Peter's and Mississippi rivers, was ordered to be engrossed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, appropriating $100,000 to the road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was taken up on its third reading, and after some remarks from Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, in opposition, was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Rugles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, and Williams of Mississippi—22.

GAD HUMPHREYS.

The bill for the relief of Gad Humphreys, of the Territory of Florida, for property destroyed by order of an officer of the United States, was taken up; and, after a long discussion, in which Messrs. HUBBARD, NORVELL, SMITH of Indiana, KING, WRIGHT, and CALHOUN, participated, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After an executive session, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 21, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read, Mr. HAYNES rose, and remarked that only six weeks of the session remained, and they had not yet referred the President's message; he therefore asked the consent of the House to go into committee thereon.

Objection being made, Mr. HAYNES moved a suspension of the rules; on which motion

Mr. CRABB demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 84, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Buchanan, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Cheatham, Coffin, Coles, Connor, Crary, Cushman, Drougote, Edwards, Farrington, Fry, James Garland, Rice Garland, Grandland, Grant, Gray, Haley, Hamer, Harper, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Hubley, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Lewis, Loomis, Mallory, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Martin, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Noble, Parker, Parmenter, Phelps, Pickens, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Richardson, Rives, Rumsey, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shepler, Snyder, Stuart, Swearingen, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Webster, Weeks, Whittelsey, Lewis Williams, Jared W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Bond, Borden, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Childs, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Davies, Deberry, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grennell, Hall, Harrison, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Howard, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Mitchell, Matthias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Sheffer, Shields, Southgate, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, John White, Sherard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, Yell, and Yorke—74.

Not being two thirds, the House refused to suspend the rules.

CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the House, as soon as he can, what number of the Cherokee tribe of Indians are now remaining in the State of North Carolina; what means the Government has provided for their subsistence; and why they were not removed west of the Mississippi river, according to the terms of the treaty, and the provisions of an act of Congress, passed at the last session; and also how, to whom, and for what has the money appropriated under that act, for subsistence and removal of the Cherokee Indians, been expended and applied.

The resolution having been read, Mr. HAYNES said he had just received a letter representing a similar state of facts, except that the number of suffering Indians was greater than stated by Mr. GRAHAM, (five or six hundred.) Mr. H.'s letter conveyed the information that these Indians had fallen back.

Mr. GRAHAM replied that his information was that these Indians had never taken up the line of march at all.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was aware that great complaints had been made in relation to this matter, and also very great complaints on the part of the volunteers, recently called into the service of the United States in that section. He would, therefore, ask his friend to accept an amendment, calling upon the Secretary of War also to inform this House why these volunteers had not been paid for their services.

Mr. GRAHAM did not wish to have his resolution embarrassed, and therefore declined accepting his colleague's amendment.

Mr. DE GRAFF moved the previous question; which prevailed, and the resolution was agreed to.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the select committee, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in.

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to inquire into the charges of high crimes and misdemeanors against P. K. Lawrence, Judge of the district court of the United States, for the State of Louisiana, be authorized to send for persons, papers, and records.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, brought in a bill for the relief of Captain Joshua Hunt; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Petitions and memorials were then called for in the order of States.

Messrs. EVANS, ROBINSON, DAVEE, and ANDERSON, of Maine.

[Mr. DAVEE presented the petition of Thomas M. Proble and eighty-one others, citizens of Lebanon, in the State of Maine, praying Congress not to admit any new State to the Union, whose constitution tolerates slavery, and to reject all applications and propositions for the annexation of Texas to the United States, and requesting that the petitioners may be heard in person, or by counsel, before the committee; which petition was laid on the table under the order of the 12th December, 1838.]

Messrs. CUSHMAN and ATHERTON, of New Hampshire.

[Mr. CUSHMAN presented the petition of Theopelus Somerby, praying for back pay as an invalid pensioner; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Also, the petition of John A. Dickerson, praying compensation for services rendered the United States as sailing master of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Also, the petition of John Haven and others, praying Congress to recognize the independence of the Republic of Hayti; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.]

Messrs. FLETCHER, GRENNELL, REED, CUSHING, LINCOLN, BORDEN, SALTONSTALL, PARMENTER, and ADAMS, of Massachusetts.

[Mr. PARMENTER presented the petition of Daniel Blanchard and fifty-two others, of Charlestown, Linn, Boston, and other places, for an amendment in the law granting a bounty to vessels engaged in the fisheries; of Sarah R. Morse, for arrears of pension; of James B. Woodbury and fifty-six others, legal voters of Acton, in Massachusetts, praying that all orders of the House abridging the right of petition may be rescinded; of Abby D. Cowdry and forty others, matrons of Acton, for the same object; of Mary Stratton and one hundred and twenty-four other women of Groton, Massachusetts, for the same object; of Sarah C. Rugg and eighty-five other women of Groton, Massachusetts, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and of the slave trade between the States; of D. Phelps and seventy-one others, legal voters of Groton, for the recognition of the Republic of Hayti.]

Mr. ADAMS said he had a large number of petitions to present on the subject of abolition, and asked leave of the House to explain the position he occupied, and to state the reasons of his adopting the course he had done in presenting petitions of this character. He further asked this courtesy of the House, because he had received a mass of letters threatening him with assassination for this course. His real position, he was convinced, was not understood in the country.

Objection being made to Mr. A. making his statement,

Mr. GRENELL moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BOND called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 117, nays 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Andrews, Ayerling, Beatty, Bicknell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Darlington, Davce, Davies, De Graff, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Howard, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keimble, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Lewis, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Menetee, Milligan, Mitchell, Moore, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parker, Parmenter, Pearce, Peck, Phelps, Plumer, Pope, Potts, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Rariden, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Sheffer, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Stuart, Stratton, Talafarro, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Vall, Vanderveer, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and York—117.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Banks, Beers, Birdsall, Boon, Bronson, Chaney, Chapin, Cole, Connor, Crabb, Deberry, Dromgoolle, Duncan, Farrington, James Graham, Grant, Griffin, Hainer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holtsey, Holt, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Joseph Johnson, Logan, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Mercer, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Parris, Petrikin, Richardson, Rives, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shepler, Spencer, Stanly, Stone, Swearingen, Taylor, Turney, Sherrard Williams, Word, and Yell—58.

So the rule was suspended.

Mr. ADAMS then made his statement, in the course of which he distinctly averred that, though he had so earnestly advocated the right of persons to petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, yet he was not himself prepared to grant their prayer. On the contrary, if the question were presented at once, he should vote against it. He knew not what change might be wrought upon his mind by a full and fair discussion; but as yet he had seen no reason to change his opinion, though he had read all that had been written and published on this subject by the Abolitionists themselves. Mr. A. then went at length into his reasons for offering the resolutions of inquiry on the controversy between Messrs. Stevenson and O'Connell.

Mr. A. having concluded his explanatory remarks, at three o'clock proceeded to present to the House his numerous petitions praying for the abolition of slavery, for the repeal of the resolutions passed by the House on the 12th December upon that subject, and also that the mover of the same receive a vote of censure for introducing them into the House. Also, petitions praying for the recognition of the independence of Hayti, and against the admission into the Union of any new State tolerating slavery. Also, petitions praying for the establishing a congress of nations.

Mr. A. having got through at four o'clock, petitions and memorials were further presented by Messrs. CRANSTON and TILLINGHAST, of Rhode Island.

Mr. PHELPS, of Connecticut.

Messrs. HALL, ALLAN, and EVERETT, of Vermont.

[Mr. ALLAN presented the petition of Hector Adams and one hundred and ninety-nine others, for the erection of a bridge from Milton to South Hero, upon a sand-bar in Lake Champlain. Also, the petition of one hundred and eighteen inhabitants of Burlington, Vermont, against the admission of any new State whose constitution tolerates slavery, and against the annexation of Texas to the Union. Also, the petition of one hundred and twelve citizens of Burlington, Vermont, for the recognition in the usual form and manner, and to enter into the customary international relations with the Republic of Hayti. Also, the petition of one hundred and thirteen inhabitants of Burlington, Vermont, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and Territory of Florida, and to prohibit the traffic of slaves between the States. Also, the petition of fifty freemen of Westford, Vermont, against new slave States and against the admission of Texas. Also, the petition of fifty freemen of Westford, Vermont, against slavery and slave trade in the District of Columbia and Territories, and slave trade between the States.]

Mr. EVERETT presented joint resolutions of the State of Vermont, passed unanimously by the Legislature of that State, praying the abolition of slavery, against the annexation of Texas to the Union, and praying for the rescinding the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives on the 12th December last upon the subject of abolition.

The SPEAKER decided that these resolutions, under the rule, lie upon the table, and cited instances on record that similar resolutions of State Legislatures had, under a similar resolution of this House, been laid upon the table without being read, debated, or printed.

Mr. EVERETT then took an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SLADE spoke sometime in opposition to the decision of the Speaker, and against the resolutions taking the course indicated by the resolutions adopted by the House on the 12th December.

Mr. PARKER inquired of the Chair, whether the appeal could be debated?

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the appeal could be debated, if it be done without entering into the merits of the question of abolition.

Mr. SLADE having finished his remarks,

The SPEAKER further stated, in support of his decision, that, according to the parliamentary law, every member had the right to demand the reading of any matter or paper upon which he was compelled to vote; but this House had, by the resolution adopted, prejudged the matter. The resolutions passed by this session of Congress were almost identical in language to those adopted in 1835, by which joint resolutions of a State Legislature were laid on the table without being read, debated, or referred.

The question was then raised whether the joint resolutions, similar in character to those now presented, fell within the same vortex with petitions from individuals. The Chair then decided that they did, and his decision was sustained by a large majority of the House. The resolution touching this matter, passed at the present session, reads as follows:

"That every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching or relating, in any way whatever, to slavery or the abolition thereof, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table, without being debated, printed, or referred."

The Chair has no alternative left, under this resolution, and the construction heretofore given it by the House, than to give these joint resolutions the same direction as other propositions touching the same subject.

Mr. BRONSON moved the previous question.

Mr. PARRIS moved to lay the whole subject upon the table; and upon this motion,

Mr. EVERETT demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER divided the House; but no quorum voting,

Mr. MORGAN moved that the House adjourn; which was decided in the negative.

Mr. MORGAN moved a call of the House; which motion was lost.

Mr. HAYNES moved that the House adjourn; upon which motion,

Mr. HARRISON demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 22, 1839.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Navy Department, transmitting a statement of contracts made by the Commissioner of the Navy during the year 1838, prepared in obedience to the act of 3d March, 1809, further to amend the several acts for the establishment of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented a memorial signed by the officers of the United States revenue cutter Jackson, praying Congress to extend the Navy pension laws so as to include those employed in the revenue service; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of Charles J. Catlett, praying to be remunerated for property destroyed by the enemy during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of Nancy Stephens; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TIPTON presented a letter from the War Department in relation to the improvement of the harbor of Michigan City; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, introduced a petition, signed by over three hundred citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, asking Congress to aid, by a subscription to the stock of the Jeffersonville and New Albany Canal Company, in constructing a steamboat canal around the falls of the Ohio, on the Indiana side.

Mr. S. said it would be recollected by the Senate that he had introduced petitions at the last session, numerous signed, from different points on the Ohio, on this subject, and that no final action had been had upon them. He said he hoped he need not advertise the committee and the Senate of the importance of this work to the whole commerce of the Ohio; nor need he urge the matter upon the attention of the committee. He felt assured the importance of the measure would recommend it to the early attention of the committee.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, presented the petition of sundry owners of coasting vessels, praying for an appropriation for placing three buoys on the coast between Nantucket and Chatham, in the State of Maine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Nathan Ranney, surveyor of the port of St. Louis, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to amend the act respecting the judiciary system of the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported a bill to alter the times of holding the October terms of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Abeshai Howell, John Grigsby, and Betsey Booth.

Mr. MORRIS, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of John Bosworth, Moses Sterling, the widow of Ebenezer Adams, and of Samuel Brown.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Dennis Trammell, reported the same without amendment, recommending its passage.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Bulow; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the same committee, to which had been referred the memorial and documents of Joseph M. Hernandez, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the same committee, reported a bill to provide for payment of damages sustained by individuals in the wars with Indian tribes since 1830; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the petition of John H. McIntosh, made an unfavorable report thereon.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made unfavorable reports on the memorial of the heirs of Colonel William Grayson, deceased, and the petition of the executor of William Terrill.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. NICHOLAS submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before the Senate a statement of the contracts, prices, and expenditures of every nature, by the Ordnance Department, for the construction of cannon and howitzers of malleable iron; the number, description, and relative weight of all the cannon and howitzers already made of that material for the department, and the cost thereof per pound, including all incidental expenses; also, a like statement with reference to brass cannon and howitzers; also, a like statement with reference to wrought-iron cannon and howitzers; also, a comparative statement of the cost, durability, and utility of cannon and howitzers made of cast iron, malleable iron, wrought iron, and brass, as applicable to field service, and also to fortifications.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate all correspondence, if any has been had since his last annual message, between this Government and the Government of Great Britain, respecting the northeastern boundary, or the establishment of a convention for the settlement thereof.

DUELING IN THE DISTRICT.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to prohibit the giving or accepting, within the District of Columbia, of a challenge to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

After some remarks from Mr. PRENTISS, in explanation of the merits and objects of the bill,

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved to strike out the fourth section, contending that it was unconstitutional.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, said that he entertained no difference of opinion now from that which he entertained at the last session on this section of the bill. It was said then as now, that this provision in the bill was designed to punish an act perpetrated beyond the limits of the District. Is it so? The object of the bill is not only to prevent dueling in the District, but to prevent its perpetration elsewhere, when it is projected and originates in the District, and consummated beyond its limits, with a view of evading the law of Congress, which can extend no further than the limits of the District. The law, in his view, would be wholly ineffectual, unless this provision of the bill should be retained. The law is designed to operate and bear upon the criminal acts of the inhabitants of the District. Is it, then, or may it be made, criminal in the people of the District to conspire and combine together within the District to commit a crime beyond the limits of it? If it is, there can be no doubt that Congress has the power to make a law to arrest the progress of crime at any time after the first step is taken for the commission of it, and to punish every act which tends to its perpetration. If the parties who intend to fight without the District, have that understanding within it, and before they leave it, is not this understanding, then, however it may have been brought about, the incipient step to the final consummation of the crime which is to be, and is, performed or consummated beyond the limits? Most certainly it is. Suppose two or more persons, within the District, were to conspire together to commit murder, or any other crime, beyond the limits of the District, and in pursuance of this conspiracy, the murder was committed by a part only of the conspirators, while the others remained within the District, taking no further part in the act than to consent to, and approve of, the crime thus perpetrated: could they not be punished for this offense against the laws of the District, or is no act criminal except that which finishes the crime? Yes, sir, every step, every act, and every motion tending to the perpetration of the crime, is criminal, and the offender liable to punishment for it wherever these inchoate acts may have taken place. He was, therefore, in favor of retaining this provision in the bill, and, without it, he should consider the bill worse than useless.

Mr. NORVELL was in favor of the motion to strike out. This was, he said, strictly a constitutional question; and he could not suppose that the authority of Lord Bacon, or any other old English lawyer, who lived one or two hundred years before the adoption of our Constitution, ought to have any weight upon it. Lord Bacon had been described by one of the old English poets as and in this point of view his moral character would not have given him any great weight in his own day. But to cite him as authority on questions arising under the Constitution of the United States was a departure from that accuracy which usually characterized the Senator from Vermont. The case alluded to by the Senator from Connecticut to illustrate his position on this bill showed that the section under consideration was untenable. He asked if an act conceived here, and consummated without the District, could be constitutionally punished here—punished where the act was not committed, but merely imagined? He certainly could not think that a majority of the Senate could entertain the opinion that this section was constitutional, when it proposed the punishment of an offense imagined within the District, but consummated elsewhere, under another jurisdiction. He could hardly suppose that the Senate could sanction the principle that Congress had any power to authorize the punishment of the crime of dueling within the limits of Virginia or Maryland.

"The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind;"

Mr. TALLMADGE rose, at the request of the author of the bill, [Mr. PRENTISS,] to cite another authority in its support, without going back to Lord Bacon. The State of New York had, in 1838, passed a bill similar to this; and though the constitutionality of it was questioned, both branches of the Legislature passed it by large majorities.

Mr. PRENTISS denied that there was any attempt in this bill to punish an offense committed without the District. It was an attempt to punish that part of the offense only which was committed here. It was competent for Congress to punish a conspiracy here to commit a theft or arson out of the District, and this was precisely such a case. He cited Lord Bacon as very high authority. He did not wish to go into the character of that distinguished jurist, but he would say that, on all legal questions, no higher authority could be cited.

Mr. WALL said that the section aimed to punish, not the fighting of the duel, but the conspiracy entered into for the purpose of evading the punishment intended for that offense. Can any Senator doubt the existence of a power in Congress to punish a conspiracy within the ten miles square to do any unlawful act out of it? He would ask gentlemen who raise the constitutional doubt to suppose that a conspiracy was entered into in this District to seduce away the property of persons in the neighborhood, or to excite slaves to escape from their masters, or to commit larceny in the adjoining States: would it not be competent (he would not say wise) for Congress to punish the persons engaged in such conspiracy? Can Congress not punish a conspiracy in the District to commit a crime without the District? The only difficulty arises from the confounding of terms and the object of this section—confounding the conspiracy to fight a duel with the fighting of the duel itself. He thought there was no necessity of reverting to ancient authorities; it was merely a question of policy. He could not perceive the slightest ground on which to raise a doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to declare the criminality of the act intended to be punished, and to punish it as provided in the section in question.

Mr. NILES contended that the bill was intended not to punish an offense committed out of the District, but to punish the incipency of the offense here. It was not to punish the offense out of the District, but the act connected with it, and which led to it. Whether it was just or reasonable to do so was not the question; but there was no doubt of the right of Congress to punish such an offense. The act proposed to be punished was, as had been well observed by the Senator from New Jersey, a conspiracy or combination to do an unlawful act. Now, was not a conspiracy to do an unlawful act, in itself a crime, and was it not competent for Congress to punish? The act proposed to be punished is a crime—it is committed in our limits, and by persons subject to our jurisdiction.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said it would be time enough to decide the question whether we can punish a conspiracy to commit an offense elsewhere, when that question was fairly presented to the Senate; but he denied that that question was then before them. Mr. C. read the section he objected to, and said that it was plain that the intention must not only be entertained here, but that the act must be consummated beyond the District. Now, it was not pretended that a conspiracy, or agreement to commit an offense, was to be punished under this bill; but certain acts must be done elsewhere, before the punishment will apply. If we pass this law in its present shape, an individual may be punished here for an offense for which he may be punished by the courts of Virginia and Maryland. As regards the intimation of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] whether a certain offense cited by him can be punished under an act of Congress, he would say that he had no doubt of it. If, by publications or any other means, there should be a seduction of the property belonging to individuals in the adjoining States, or if they should be excited to commit crime, then it would be within the competency of Congress to punish it, either under the Constitution or in accordance with the principles of international law. He was not disposed to occupy the time of the Senate, and would barely observe that this was presented at the last session, when this objectionable sentence was stricken out. He hoped the same amendment would be made now.

Mr. SOUTHARD opposed the motion to strike out the fourth section. This section provides for the punishment of a conspiracy for the purpose of evading the penalties inflicted by the act. The bill provides, in the first place, for the punishment of a crime, and then provides for the punishment of acts intended to evade the provisions of the law. The intention is to punish the previous arrangement or concert in the District to perpetrate the crime, which is afterwards consummated without the limits of the District. He had no doubt whatever of the power of Congress to punish this conspiracy as it would a conspiracy to perpetrate any other criminal act. Mr. S. contended that the remainder of the bill was a dead letter, if this section was stricken out, on account of the great facilities that existed to evade it. He hoped, if we passed the bill at all, it would be passed with this provision retained in it.

After some remarks from Mr. MORRIS, The question was taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, and it was rejected—yeas 11, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, King, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Spence, and White—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Wright, and Young—31.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

COURT IN ALABAMA.

The bill from the House to reorganize the district court of the United States for the district of Alabama, was read twice, and referred.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time, and passed:

A bill for the relief of Loomis & Gay;
A bill to prevent the counterfeiting of foreign gold, silver, and copper coins, and for the punishment thereof;

A joint resolution providing for the purchase of the island at the confluence of the St. Peter's and Mississippi rivers; and

A bill for the relief of Gad Humphreys.

PIERRE MENARD.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Senate took up the bill for the relief of Pierre Menard and others.

Mr. KING, after some remarks, moved to strike out the provision for the payment of interest.

On this question a debate ensued, in which Messrs. CRITTENDEN, PRESTON, NILES, CLAY of Kentucky, YOUNG, and ROBINSON, participated.

The motion to strike out was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then went into the consideration of executive business; after which it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 22, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read,

Mr. HAYNES rose and renewed his request to be allowed to move that the House go into committee on the President's message.

Mr. HOWARD said he was sorry, but he was compelled to object.

Mr. HAYNES then moved a suspension of the rules. He would ask leave to move to discharge the committee, and bring the message into the House; but he wished to make some remarks himself in committee, and so did other gentlemen, and all he wanted was fair play.

Mr. HOWARD said he should take the first opportunity of testing the sense of the House, whether it would act on the bill providing for the payment of French spoliations before 1800; and with that view he inquired of the Chair if Mr. HAYNES's motion could be now amended or divided?

The SPEAKER replied in the negative, but added that if the rules were suspended, then the motion would be susceptible of amendment.

At the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. HAYNES then varied his motion, by moving to discharge the committee from the message.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he must object to that motion.

Mr. HAYNES said it seemed to be a very difficult matter to concur with the wishes of any gentleman; and, therefore, he renewed his original motion to go into committee.

The motion was disagreed to.

On his motion, Mr. HOPKINS was discharged from further attendance on the select committee on the memorial of Francis P. Blair, he being on the committee on the New York defalcations.

The resolution reported by Mr. CLOWNEY, from the Committee on the Expenditures in the War Department, directing the Secretary of War to call upon Samuel Lewis for the repayment of $800 paid to him for the services of his son, a minor, was further postponed, on motion of Mr. McKENNAN, on account of the absence of Mr. C., until Thursday next.

PETITIONS.

Petitions were, on leave, presented by Messrs. CARTER, LEGARE, and SAWYER.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Ebenczer A. Lester.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Jackson.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, without amendment, the Senate bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause the mineral lands of the several States and Territories belonging to the United States to be sold as other lands of the United States.

Also, with an amendment, the Senate bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas who lost their improvements in consequence of the Choctaw treaty.

Mr. C. also reported a bill to grant to the counties of Lee, Des Moines, Jackson, and Dubuque, Iowa, land to aid in erecting public buildings.

Mr. BOULDIN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, moved to set apart the 13th of February, to be assigned for the consideration of bills on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to by a vote of two thirds.

Mr. BEIRNE, from the same committee, reported a bill to incorporate the Washington City Benevolent Society.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, reported a bill to incorporate the Navy Yard Beneficial Society, in the city of Washington.

Also, a bill to incorporate the Lafayette Beneficial Society, in the city of Washington.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, brought in again the bill to reorganize the district courts of the United States in the State of Alabama, with sundry amendments, which were all concurred in, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue a duplicate land warrant to Abraham Wright, of New York; which was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. RARIDEN, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to confirm the sale of certain reservations in Indiana; and the bill was passed.

Mr. BRONSON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to authorize the election or appointment of certain officers in the Territory of Iowa, and for other purposes.

Also, a bill to amend the act establishing the territorial government of Wisconsin.

Mr. CHILDS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Elijah Foshee.

Mr. MENEFE, from the Committee on Patents, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill to renew the patent of Thomas Blanchard. The amendment was concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to authorize the construction of a road from Dubuque, in the Territory of Iowa, to the northern part of the State of Missouri, and for other purposes.

Also, with an amendment, the bill (which had been recommitted) giving the assent of Congress to the act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company. [The amendment prohibited the construction of the road in the cities of Washington and Georgetown till the survey or plan was approved by the corporate authorities of those cities.]

The amendment was concurred in, and the bill ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, made unfavorable reports upon the petitions and memorials of William C. Miller, Benjamin Sayer, and T. D. Peurifveys; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the same committee, made favorable reports on the petitions of Abraham Forbes and Richard Brannin, and others.

Mr. STUART, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Gilbert Howell.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Henry Pierson.

Mr. DEGRAFF, from the Committee on Commerce, made an unfavorable report on the petition of David Griffin.

Mr. CHEATHAM, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Marcus Spalding.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of James White.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of George Baldwin; also, on the memorial of certain citizens of Wisconsin, praying Congress to furnish that Territory with arms.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Zalmon Burnett and Isaac Moss.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John Porter.

Mr. CHILDS, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Lydia Steele, William Kerr, John McLain, and John W. Godbold.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of George Rawlings, Benjamin Eaton, Amos Cooke, Alexander Downing, heirs of David Bradish, and the heirs of John Sprigg.

Mr. EWING, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Elizabeth Gassaway.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Joseph Rose, James Smallwood, and John Packham.

Mr. HEROD, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Leonard Joines, William Steele, John Hilberts, John Thompson, Oriss Call, and Jacob Headerich.

Mr. PLUMER, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Mrs. Addison, widow of William A. Addison, William Wingfield, Thomas Flanagan, Nimrod Sparks, and John Freger.

Mr. ALLEN, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Daniel Keifer.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill making appropriations for certain repairs and improvements in the public buildings and grounds, and for other purposes.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. EVERETT, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which lies over one day under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House copies of the instructions given for negotiating the treaties with the Pottawatomie Indians of the 20th, 25th, and 27th October, 1832; and of all the correspondence of or with the Department before and after those dates, relating to the negotiation of said treaties, or to the execution before the ratification of the same; and also copies of all the bills of purchase of all goods, merchandise, and horses, delivered to said Indians or other persons, during the said negotiations, or at the time of signing said treaties, for any purpose, or subsequently delivered in execution of the same; together with a statement of the expense of negotiating said treaties, with the names of the persons to whom paid, and the sum paid to each.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER announced the orders of the day, and laid before the House the following executive communications; which were appropriately referred:

1. The following message from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1839.

In addition to the information contained in a report from the Secretary of State, communicated with my message of the 30th of April, 1838, I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of War, dated the 16th instant, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 19th of March last, and containing so much of the information called for by said resolution as could be furnished by his Department.

M. VAN BUREN.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2. Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 14th instant, calling for seven hundred and fifty copies of the chart of Newark bay, and of the sand-bars in the vicinity of said bay.

3. Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th instant, relative to the pursuit, capture, and execution of certain reputed Indian refugees and murderers within the limits of one of the States.

4. Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the contracts made by the commissioners of the Navy during the year 1838, prepared in compliance with an act of Congress.

Sundry bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred.

The graduation bill being taken up, Mr. CASEY moved to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to refer it to the select committee of twenty-six on the public lands, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MENEFE made a few remarks in favor of sending the bill to the select committee of twenty-six, as proposed by Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. CASEY said he had not been able to hear all the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MENEFFEE,] but from the whole tenor of the debate, it was obvious that the object of the motion to refer this bill to the select committee was to defeat the passage of this bill at this session. This was a measure of deep interest to the new States, and indeed to the whole western country. It was a subject that legitimately belonged to the Committee on Public Lands, one that had heretofore received the attention of that committee, and if it was the intention of the House to act on the subject at this session, it should go to that committee.

As to the select committee raised on the special message of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in answer to the resolution of this House, in relation to the division of the public lands among the old States of the Union, he thought, with all due deference to that committee, that if they would attend to the arduous duties devolving on them, they would have enough to do. He repeated, he was in favor of the bill, and should therefore insist on his motion to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

The first motion was further advocated by Messrs. SHIELDS, HAYNES, PARKER, BOON, and MARTIN, and opposed by Messrs. MENEFFEE, ROBERTSON, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina; when

Mr. HOWARD demanded the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, who, after a few words in behalf of the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, renewed it.

The SPEAKER, in answer to Mr. EVERETT, stated that the main question would be on the engrossment of the bill; whereupon

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew the demand for the previous question, and the question of reference was further debated in opposition to the first motion by Mr. LINCOLN, and in support by Messrs. EWING, CUSHING, and SHIELDS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was opposed to referring the bill to either committee, though, if it went to either, it should be to that of twenty-six. He was also opposed to discussing the reference of a bill which, in his opinion, ought never to pass; and, therefore, in order to test the question on its passage, he moved to lay the bill on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BOON moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in till one hundred and fifty-seven members had answered to their names; when the absentees were called, and several having answered, one hundred and seventy-one were found to be present.

Mr. MURRAY moved to dispense with the further proceedings of the call; but the motion was disagreed to.

The doors were then closed, and the absentees again called over, when excuses were rendered for several of the members.

Mr. THOMPSON made another ineffectual motion to dispense with the call.

Mr. T. then moved the enforcement of the balance of the 57th rule, to send special messengers for the absentees not excused, and take them into custody.

Mr. CASEY notified the House that there were a number of members in attendance outside the Hall, and he moved that the doors be opened for their admission; which motion was lost.

Mr. GRENELL suggested that the Speaker send messengers to the absentees to request their attendance; but it was objected to.

The question on executing the 57th rule was then decided in the negative—ayes 65, noes 69.

Mr. SIBLEY then moved to dispense with the call.

Mr. THOMPSON asked for the yeas and nays; but they were refused.

The call was then dispensed with—ayes eighty, noes not counted.

The doors were then opened, and a number of members came in.

Mr. SAWYER moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. SAWYER withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken on laying the graduation bill on the table, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Anderson, Ayer, Banks, Borden, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, John Campbell, Chambers, Childs, Coffin, Coles, Corwin, Cranston, Darling, Davee, Davies, Deberry, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, James Garland, Giddings, James Graham, Grant, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Henry, Hoffman, Hopkins, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Legare, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, McKennan, Meneffee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Mathias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Parris, Pearce, Peck, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Potter, Putnam, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Underwood, John White, Lewis Williams, Worthington, and Yorke—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Cambreleng, Chaney, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Crabb, Cray, Crockett, Cushing, Cushman, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Ewing, Farrington, Fry, Gallup, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Gray, Hamer, Haynes, Herod, Howard, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingsmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Martin, Maury, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Parker, Phelps, Plumer, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Ariden, Rives, Sheffield, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Webster, Albert S. White, Whittey, Sheridan Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yell—97.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Before the vote was announced, Mr. WORD asked leave to record his vote, he having left the Hall, and did not return in time; but it was objected to.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The next bill taken up was the bill from the Senate making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. COLES moved to lay this bill also on the table; on which motion,

Mr. CASEY demanded the yeas and nays; but, before they were ordered,

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 23, 1839.

Mr. YOUNG presented resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress to use their best exertions to procure the passage of a law making appropriations sufficient to put all the unsurveyed lands of the State under immediate contract; and,

On motion of Mr. Y., the resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of Levi Folsom; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NORVELL presented certain additional papers in support of the claim of General Nelson Thompson; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of William Tracy, a soldier of the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented certain papers in relation to a claim of Abel Pennington, accompanied by the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making payment to Abel Pennington, for a horse employed in the service of the United States, which was killed by order of the commanding officer.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Washington Manual Labor School and Male Orphan Asylum of the city of Washington, and a bill to incorporate the Washington City Silk Company; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the petition of the Petersburg Railroad Company, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Warden.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Marshall A. Mathias.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of making compensation to Robert Kirkland for the destruction of his timber and stock, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which motion was agreed to, and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, reported a bill providing compensation to certain Michigan volunteers, lately called into the service to preserve our neutral relations on the frontiers; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The reports of the Committee on Pensions, unfavorable to the petitions of John Bosworth, Stephen F. Hemenway, John Grigsby, and Betsey Booth, were severally considered and concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NORVELL, in pursuance of notice given, obtained leave and introduced a bill making grants of public lands to certain States for purposes of internal improvement; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FULTON, in pursuance of notice given, obtained leave, and introduced a bill in relation to certain railways in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice and referred:

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions, submitted a few days ago by Mr. LINN, in relation to certain banks of Wisconsin, were taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate any information he may possess in relation to the banks, or institutions exercising banking privileges, in the Territory of Wisconsin; whether they are exercising such privileges in pursuance or in violation of the laws of the United States; and whether their notes are received in payment for the public lands.

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to report a bill to disaffirm, disapprove, and render null and void any act of the Territorial Legislature creating banking institutions in Wisconsin Territory, where charters have not been approved by Congress, or where the provisions of their charters, or the acts of Congress approving them, have been violated.

Resolved, That the committee also report a bill to give jurisdiction to the courts of the Territories of the United States over all the banking institutions in said Territories, and to provide punishments for the violation of the act of Congress of the 1st July, 1836, or of any other act that has been, or may hereafter be, passed, approving bank charters.

Mr. NORVELL had very strong doubts of the power of Congress to annul bank charters already approved. At all events, he thought the resolution should be put in the shape of an inquiry.

Mr. LINN said the resolutions were intended as an inquiry.

Mr. KING observed that the resolution directed the committee to report a bill, &c., and he would suggest to his honorable friend to modify it so as to direct the committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill.

Mr. LINN assented, and the resolution was modified accordingly.

Mr. ALLEN observed that the resolution included only one Territory. He would suggest to the Senator from Missouri to modify it so as to include all the Territories.

This modification was agreed to, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, required to report to the Senate the name of each individual, other than officers of the Army, who has received any appointment or agency, under the authority of the United States, to aid in carrying into effect the provisions of the treaty with the Cherokee Indians, dated 29th December, 1835, with the duty he was directed and expected to perform, and the sum promised or paid to each, and by whom such appointments were made.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, required to report to the Senate what species of funds were furnished by the United States to their agents, to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty with the Cherokee Indians, dated 29th December, 1835, and if funds of different species have been furnished, state the amount of each, together with the time when sent, and to whom, and whether any of such funds have been exchanged, and by whom, for funds less valuable, and a premium received for the difference of value, and whether such premiums have been accounted for to the Government.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War, be, and he hereby is, required to report to the Senate the name of each individual whose improvements have been valued, under the provisions of the treaty with the Cherokees, dated 29th December, 1835, and the sum to which each has been valued, together with the instructions given to the person making such valuation.

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolutions; which were ordered to be printed and lie on the table:

Resolved, That sound specie-paying banks ought to be selected, under suitable regulations to be prescribed by law, for the safe-keeping of the public money.

Resolved, That the payment of the public revenue ought to be made in gold and silver, or in the notes of sound specie-paying banks, under suitable regulations to be prescribed by law.

Resolved, That such payments of the public revenue from customs and from lands ought to be made, as far as practicable, by deposits in the selected banks to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and the certificates of deposit taken by the collectors and receivers as evidence of such payments.

Resolved, That the selected banks, in consideration of such deposits, ought to perform, without charge, the same duties to the Government, in transferring the public funds and distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, as were performed by the late Bank of the United States.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

A bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases;

A bill for the relief of Pierre Monard and others; and

A bill to prohibit the giving or accepting a challenge to fight a duel in the District of Columbia, and for the punishment thereof.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, the yeas and nays were ordered on the passage of the last mentioned bill; and were—yeas 29, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Monon, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Williams of Maine, and Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Clay of Alabama, King, Nicholas, Preston, Ronne, and Williams of Mississippi—7.

LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the Senate took up the bill to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to lands therein described," &c., passed 18th April, 1806.

Mr. FOSTER addressed the Senate at length in explanation and support of the bill.

Mr. BENTON rose to give his testimony in favor of the statements which had been made by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. FOSTER,] who had so well opened this subject. It so happened that he (Mr. B.) was well acquainted with the whole subject matter of this bill, both with the legal question, as growing out of the compact of 1806, between the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, and the General Government, and also with the character of the land itself upon which it would operate. Three years after the making of that compact, and precisely thirty years ago, he (Mr. B.) was a member of the Senate of the State of Tennessee, with the respected father of the Senator who had just spoken; and in his capacity of a Senator in the Tennessee Legislature, it became his duty, as far back as the year 1809, to act upon this compact; and he then began the course with respect to settlers and occupants which he had followed ever since; he then favored the settlers south of French Broad and Holston, who were settled on the part of the ungranted lands which fell to the State of Tennessee, and it now becoming his duty again to act, in the Senate of the United States, on that part of the ungranted lands which were then reserved to the United States, he should follow the same course now which he did then, and continue to favor and to protect the settler.

He (Mr. B.) was not only acquainted with the compact of 1806, but it happened that he was well acquainted with the country which was reserved to the United States. He lived, when a citizen of Tennessee, not within the Congress reservation; but in the quarter of the State in which it lay, and practiced law within it. He had, besides, traveled all over it in different directions; and, while it was in fact a fine district of country, (though by no means the best in the State,) yet it had been so picked and culled by entries on land warrants, that what remained was nothing but the merest refuse, barely fit to make small farms for people in indigent circumstances, and which the Federal Government ought to be ashamed to sell. The bill proposed to sell to the occupants, in tracts not exceeding two hundred acres each, at twelve and a half cents per acre. That sum would, doubtless, seem to be a low price to many gentlemen on this floor; but he considered it too high for the Federal Government to demand, and should have liked the bill better if it had abandoned these scraps of refuse land to the State and to the occupants. Individually, he should have liked the bill better in that way; but the Senators from the State who had the conduct of the bill had their reasons, and he knew they were good reasons, for proposing a sale instead of a cession. He should, therefore, support the bill as it was; and lest any Senator might suppose it would be better to strike out the twelve and a half cents, and leave the price blank, to be filled up by the General Assembly of Tennessee, he would undertake to say that nothing could be gained, in the way of money, by that operation; that it would be impossible to find men in the General Assembly of Tennessee who would value these scraps of land as high as twelve and a half cents. He, therefore, thought that to all those who chose to look to money from these lands, the sum fixed in the bill should be preferable to leaving it open to be fixed by those who knew the real character of the lands.

Mr. B. had deemed it proper, on account of his long acquaintance with the subject, to bear this public testimony in favor of the statements made by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. FOSTER.] His statements did not require to be supported by testimony; but, having lived in Tennessee, having acted in a legislative capacity upon a branch of this subject thirty years ago, and being well acquainted with the character of the lands to be disposed of, he deemed it proper to give something more than a naked vote for the bill, and therefore had submitted to the Senate the statements which his personal knowledge enabled him to make.

Mr. STRANGE had no idea that this bill would be taken up to-day, and he was not, therefore, prepared for its consideration. It would seem that the State of North Carolina was somewhat interested in it, and he should, therefore, be glad to have an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with its details. In the mean time, it occurred to him that some provision was necessary in order more effectually to guard the interests of the United States, as well as those of the State of North Carolina. For instance, the bill contained a provision to guard the State of North Carolina against loss, that the State of Tennessee should take up the outstanding North Carolina warrants, which was so far right; but there was also a provision in the latter end of this bill which in some way conflicted with this: to cede the lands remaining after 1844, unconditionally, to the State of Tennessee. Now, he wished the friends of the bill would consent to its postponement until to-morrow, to give him an opportunity of offering an amendment to meet this difficulty.

Mr. FOSTER expressed himself perfectly willing to agree to the postponement asked for.

Mr. WHITE thought the objection of the gentleman was unfounded, and that he would find, on a more careful examination, that the interests of North Carolina were amply provided for. Mr. W. expressed an anxious desire that the bill should pass this body in time to get through the other House at this session, and spoke of its importance to a portion of the people he represented. He had no objection to making the bill the special order of the day for to-morrow. There being no special order for that day, there would be no difficulty in taking it up at one o'clock, and finally deciding it. He thought that when the Senate became sufficiently acquainted with its merits, there would not be the slightest difficulty in passing it.

Mr. STRANGE observed that he had prepared an amendment, in case the bill should be pressed to-day, providing that when the cession of the remaining lands shall be made to the State of Tennessee, after the 1st of January, 1844, that State shall provide for any outstanding North Carolina warrants.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the bill was postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, to-morrow.

DR. J. C. WHITE.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Senate took up the bill for the relief of Dr. John Campbell White, of Baltimore.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, opposed the bill, and hoped that its consideration might not be pressed at this time.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate in its support; and,

After some further remarks from Mr. CLAY in opposition, and Mr. BUCHANAN in support, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 23, 1839.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the accounts of Lewis Cass, as superintendent of Indian affairs; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENRY asked leave to present a petition, but it was objected to.

GRADUATION BILL.

Mr. PETRIKIN rose and said he was about to make a motion, in the making of which, he wished it to be distinctly understood that he did it to give gentlemen an opportunity of doing themselves justice, and of putting themselves straight before the people. Nor, in making this motion, was he to be considered as in any way pledged to vote for the bill on its final passage. Mr. P. then moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which the graduation bill was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER said the motion would be entered, and would be the first thing in order after the morning business was disposed of.

Mr. SNYDER moved that the bill be printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. PICKENS suggested that the motion of Mr. PETRIKIN be disposed of at once; but

The SPEAKER reiterating what he said above, the question was not pressed.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. HAYNES then renewed his motion for the House to go into committee on the President's message.

Objection being made, Mr. H. moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, suggested to the gentleman to modify his motion, so as to go into committee after they had got through the morning business.

Mr. HAYNES withdrew his first motion, and moved another, for the House to go into committee of the Whole at half past one o'clock, but it was rejected, 101 to 53—not two thirds.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee on Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of William J. Owens, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed; also an unfavorable report on the memorial of certain citizens of St. Augustine, Florida.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of New Hampshire, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Richard Macall.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of B. M. Byrnes.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of certain merchants of New York, praying a drawback on coal, and it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to which a bill on the same subject had been referred.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition license two iron steamboats building in Europe; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WRIGHT presented some documents in support of the claim of Captain Charles C. Tupper, of the United States marine corps; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, presented the petition of David Bump, asking for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS presented the credentials of Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, elected by the Legislature of Massachusetts a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Colonel John H. Stone, deceased; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which had been referred the petition of the heirs of John Treville, deceased, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, unfavorable to the petition of William Smith, was considered and concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KING, in pursuance of notice given, obtained leave, and introduced a bill for the relief of William H. Robertson, Samuel H. Garrow, and A. W. Symington; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BENTON, in pursuance of notice given, asked leave to introduce a bill to abolish the duty on salt, and to repeal the fishing bounties and allowances dependant upon the same.

Mr. B. addressed the Senate at length in explanation and support of the bill; after which, at the request of Mr. DAVIS, it was laid on the table till to-morrow.

TREATY WITH MIAMI INDIANS.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, said he rose to ask leave to introduce a bill to regulate the price of lands acquired by the treaty with the Miami Indians of the 6th of November, 1838, which was ratified on yesterday. The bill fixed the minimum price of these lands at $2 50 per acre.

Mr. S. said his position in relation to this bill might require a single word of explanation, not so far as the Senate was concerned, as the whole matter was fresh in the recollection of Senators. But the State might desire to know why it was that he had purposed to fix the minimum of these lands at a higher price than the usual price of the public lands. He wished merely to satisfy that inquiry, by saying that these lands were purchased by the Miami Indians, by the treaty that was ratified on yesterday, at a price that would require, to remunerate the Government, the price fixed by the bill. The lands lie on the public works of the State, and the high price given was fully justified by the value of the lands. The price being the great objection to the purchase, in the minds of many Senators, he felt disposed, upon a consultation with his colleague, to remove that objection by introducing a bill that would remunerate the Government for the purchase. He had promised the Senate to do so, and he now rose to comply with that promise.

The bill was then read twice, by general consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SURVEY OF THE LAKES.

Mr. NORVELL said, that at the last session a joint resolution was reported by the Committee on Commerce, and passed by the Senate without a dissentient voice, authorizing the President of the United States to cause a survey of the north-western lakes to be made. He held in his hands letters from the Secretary of War, and the chief of the topographical bureau, recognizing the importance of the contemplated survey; and they had intimated in a different way, and under circumstances to which he could not, at this time, specifically allude, the scientific gentlemen had been sought for, and their abilities brought into requisition, with a view to this very interesting service, as well as with reference to other branches of the public interest. It was a fact, that no American chart of the lakes existed; no thorough survey of those inland seas had ever been authorized or made by this Government. We were indebted to British charts for all the knowledge we possessed on the subject, except that derived from personal observation. It was difficult to obtain any of these British charts in this country. With a view to the naval operations which a war would render necessary upon the lakes, as well as in relation to their commerce and navigation, the survey so anxiously desired was all-important. Impressed with the necessity of the measure, the committee had again instructed him to report the same resolution, without any alteration. As he hoped and believed that no debate would arise upon the resolution, he very respectfully moved that the previous orders of the day be postponed and that the joint resolution, authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made, be now taken up.

The resolution was agreed to, and the joint resolution considered, and ordered to a third reading.

PROCEEDS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate whether any, and if any, how much, would have been the deficit in the Treasury, if an act entitled "An act to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting land to certain States," which passed both Houses of Congress, had received the approbation of the President, and been acted upon up to the 1st day of January, 1839.

Mr. BENTON observed that his reason for offering this resolution was apparent. A resolution had passed the Senate calling upon the Secretary for information as to the amount that would have been distributed to each of the States of this Union under the distribution land bill, which was vetoed by President Jackson, had that bill become a law. An answer to that resolution had been received, by which it appeared that the sum that would have been distributed was $57,500,000. Now, he wished also to ascertain what now would be the deficit in the Treasury had that distribution taken place.

Mr. NORVELL rose to avail himself of the opportunity presented by the motion of the Senator from Missouri to correct a mistake into which the Commissioner of the General Land Office had fallen, in the table which he had furnished of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, which were proposed to be distributed among the several States by the bill of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY], which received the veto of President Jackson in 1833. The Commissioner had stated that certain sums under the twelve and a half per cent. proposed for the new States in that bill, and certain specified sums under the general distribution proposed in it, would have fallen to the lot of Michigan and Arkansas. If he remembered rightly, not a cent would have been received under that bill by either Michigan or Arkansas. They were at that period Territories of the United States. No participation was allowed to them in that bill. It depended upon the subsequent pleasure of Congress, upon the passage of another law, whether Michigan or Arkansas would each have received any portion of the moneys which were to be distributed, if that bill had become a law. He had felt it to be his duty to make this statement for the information of his constituents at home.

The resolution was then laid on the table till to-morrow.

DR. J. C. WHITE.

The bill for the relief of Dr. John Campbell White, of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, was read the third time and passed.

HEIRS OF T. GLASCOCK.

The bill from the House for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Glascock, deceased, was read twice and referred.

LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

The bill to amend the act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to the lands therein described, &c., was taken up as the order of the day; and, after some remarks from Mr. FOSTER, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 34, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, King, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Talmadge, Tipton, White, Williams of Mississippi, and Young—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Strange, and Williams of Maine—3.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill for the relief of the sureties of William B. Ferguson;

The bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to establish branch Mints of the United States," approved March 3, 1835;

The bill for the relief of Peter Bargy; and

The bill for the relief of Henry Wilson.

After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 24, 1839.

Petitions were, on leave, presented by Messrs. PARMENTER, STONE, HENRY, BRONSON, WORD, RARIDEN, SERGEANT, PUTNAM, and TOUCEY.

[Mr. PARMENTER presented the petition of Sarah Popkin, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Also, petition of Joseph D. Annable and others, for a duty on foreign starch; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BRONSON presented the petition of Samuel Cook and one hundred and ten others, citizens of Jefferson county, New York, praying for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Big Sandy creek, Jefferson county, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Also, the petition of Daniel Read and thirty-three others, citizens of Jefferson county, New York, for an appropriation to improve the harbor at Little Sodus Bay, on Lake Ontario, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STONE presented the petition of Jesse Epperson, a citizen of Bradley county, Tennessee, praying compensation for a horse stolen from him by the Cherokee Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HENRY presented the petition of a number of citizens of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a national armory for the manufacturing of small-arms, at the falls of Beaver river, in said county; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.]

Mr. MITCHELL moved a suspension of the rule, to call for petitions generally, but subsequently withdrew it.

Petitions were, on leave, further presented by Messrs. C. H. WILLIAMS and PETRIKIN.

[Mr. PETRIKIN presented the petition of Anna Maria Domback, widow of a revolutionary soldier, for a pension. Also, the petition of Colonel John H. Schenck, a revolutionary soldier, for increase of pension. Also, additional documents to substantiate the claim of Jacob Boston for a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.]

Mr. HAYNES presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia, in relation to the establishment of sundry post routes.

Mr. CHAPMAN presented the memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, asking that the lands within that State, lately acquired from the Cherokees, may be surveyed at an early period; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Also, the memorial of certain citizens of Benton county, Alabama, who lost their improvements by the location of Indian reservations, asking that they be allowed to enter other lands in lieu thereof; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, to which the bill on that subject has been committed. Also, the petition of many citizens of Benton and Cherokee counties, Alabama, praying that the Territory lately acquired from the Cherokee Indians may be attached to the Coosa land district, the register of that district to act for the whole district when united, and the land office from Mardisville, removed to Ladiga; which was referred to the same committee to which was referred the petition praying the establishment of a new land office in the Cherokee country.

The unfinished business of this morning was the report by Mr. CLOWNEY, from the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, the question being on the adoption of the following resolution, with which the report concludes:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to require from Samuel Lewis the repayment of the sum of $800 improperly allowed to him for the services of his son Edward (a minor) as clerk in the Pension Bureau from July, 1818, to July, 1819, together with interest from the day he received the same; and upon the refusal or neglect of the said Samuel Lewis to refund the said sum of money with interest, that the Attorney General of the United States be, and is hereby, instructed forthwith to institute proper legal proceedings for the recovery of the same.

Mr. CLOWNEY addressed the House at length to show that this money had been improperly paid.

Mr. McKAY stated the facts in support of the claim, and cited letters of Messrs. Cass, Boyd, and Edwards. Mr. McK. admitted, however, that had he been in Mr. Poinsett's place, he should not have ordered the payment of this money, though he was decidedly of opinion that Lewis had an equitable claim.

Mr. McKENNAN was opposed to the resolution, because it would involve a heavy expense; but he insisted that the Secretary of War had no right to have paid this money out of the contingent fund of the Army, and his doing so merited the severest condemnation of the House.

Mr. BOON opposed the resolution; but said he would not go back to inquire whether a previous contract had been made. All he wanted to know was, whether the services had been performed, of which there was abundant evidence, and he could not, therefore, vote for the resolution.

Mr. MARVIN supported the resolution as the only mode by which a fraud could be reached.

Mr. McKAY said it had been the practice since the formation of the Government, when extra force was required, for the Departments to employ temporary clerks, and pay them out of the contingent fund.

Mr. EVERETT said it was time this objectionable practice was put a stop to, and, therefore, he moved to recommit the report, with the following instructions:

To ascertain and report the cases in which money has been paid under the direction of the War Department, out of the contingent fund, to every officer of the Government, for arrearages of salary or compensation for his services.

Mr. ADAMS sustained the allowance; but the hour having expired, his remarks were arrested, and the subject lies over.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry executive communications:

1. From the Secretary of War, being a report of the number of clerks and extra clerks employed in that Department.

2. From the same, together with a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, reports of the Third Auditor and the Commissioner of Pensions, relative to the third section of the act of July 5, 1832, for liquidating and paying certain claims of the State of Virginia.

3. From the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the First Comptroller and Auditor, whether the standing committees of Congress are recognized by the accounting officers of the Department as a proper foundation to allow claims against the United States.

4. From the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, for the use of the members of the House, two hundred and seventy-five copies of the Naval Register for the year 1839.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, by leave, stated that the Committee of Ways and Means wished to make a report, containing at large the views of that committee in regard to the state of the finances generally; and said that the committee had come to the conclusion, that, should Congress authorize the usual amount of new appropriations, and the three millions proposed for fortifications, harbors, &c., it would be necessary to provide five or six millions for the Treasury, in addition to all the resources and receipts existing or contemplated.

The report having been then made, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HAYNES moved for the printing of ten thousand extra copies of the report.

Mr. SERGEANT opposed this motion, and was proceeding to give his reasons, when he yielded to the suggestion that, unless by general consent, that motion must lie over for one day. It lies over accordingly.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

Several executive communications were received and referred.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ADAMS in the chair.)

Mr. HOWARD moved to take up the bill for the liquidation of claims of American citizens for spoils by France prior to the treaty of 1801.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the gentleman from Maryland had better read the report of the committee which had just been made, before he pressed a bill which would require the appropriation for four or five million dollars.

Mr. HOWARD said that he had often endeavored to get up this bill, and if the gentleman had not obstructed it, he might have had an opportunity of altering his report so as to cover the necessary amount.

After further conversation between Messrs. HAYNES, McKENNAN, PICKENS, HOWARD, and CASEY, as to the order of business, the question was taken on Mr. HOWARD's motion, and negatived.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the committee then took up the resolutions offered by Mr. H. for referring the several subjects in the President's message to their appropriate committees.

After further conversation between Messrs. EVERETT, HAYNES, CAMBRELENG, HOWARD, CUSHING, and GIDDINGS, as to order,

The resolutions moved by Mr. HAYNES were read in succession, and the following were agreed to:

1. Resolved, That so much of the President's message as refers to the political relations of the United States with foreign nations, be committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the commerce of the United States with foreign nations, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

3. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the finances, to the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue, and the punishment of public defaulters, be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

4. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the public lands be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The fifth resolution was then read, as follows:

5. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to Indian affairs, except what concerns the defense of the frontiers against Indian hostilities, and the protection of the Indians against the intrusions of the citizens of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. EVERETT went into a general review of the course pursued by the Government of the United States in conducting our Indian relations, with a view to show that the position of the message on that subject was contradicted by facts.

When he had concluded his remarks, the question was taken, and the resolution agreed to.

The following resolutions were then agreed to:

6. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the defense of the frontiers against Indian hostilities, and the protection of the Indian tribes from the intrusions of citizens of the United States; so much thereof as relates to the establishment of a manufactory of small-arms west of the Alleghany mountains, and to a manufactory of gunpowder; together with so much as relates to the report of the Secretary of War, and the public interests intrusted to the War Department, except the subjects embraced in the immediately preceding resolution, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

7. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the militia of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

8. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and the interests intrusted to the Navy Department, be committed to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

9. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the report of the Postmaster General, and the condition and operations of the Post Office Department, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

10. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the District of Columbia, be committed to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The following resolution having been read:

11. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the establishment of a national foundery for cannon, to be common to the service of the Army and Navy of the United States, be referred to a select committee, to report by bill or otherwise.

The question was put, and it was rejected, (as unnecessary, a report having been made by a select committee on that subject.)

The following resolution was then read:

12. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the questions arising out of the mandamus issued by the circuit court of the District of Columbia, at the relation of Stockton and Stokes, against the Postmaster General, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On this resolution a debate of considerable length ensued, in which

Mr. EVERETT went into a history of the case, and a review of the decision of the court.

Mr. HOWARD replied, and advocated the resolution.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, went, at considerable length, into a commentary of the case, and the effect of the court's decision of it, in which he eulogized the court, and remarked with severity on the course of the executive officers in the case.

Mr. CRARY replied. He spoke in vindication of the late President, and argued to defend the language of the message in relation to the "anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth." In the course of his remarks he replied to several positions taken by Mr. BELL, in a speech in which he reviewed the message of the President. Having proceeded some time, he yielded to a motion that the committee rise; which motion prevailing, the committee rose and reported those resolutions which had been agreed to by the committee.

The House concurred in the resolutions reported, and then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 25, 1839.

The PRESIDENT submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting sixty copies of the Navy Register for 1839; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, praying Congress to take measures for a congress of nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, asking for an amendment to the preemption law passed at the last session of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BENTON presented an extract from the message of Governor Call to the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, relating to the war with the Seminoles; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. gave notice that on Monday he would call up for consideration the bill providing for the armed occupation of the Territory of Florida.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial from officers of the revenue service, praying that the benefits of the Navy pension law may be extended to them; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. R. also presented a petition from citizens of Alum Spring, Rockbridge county, for a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of Jesse Cline; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the memorial of citizens of the parish of Concordia, in the State of Louisiana, reported a bill to transfer to the inhabitants of the parish of Concordia the interest of the United States to certain tracts of land; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which had been referred the petition of Colonel F. H. Weisenfeld, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the memorial of William A. Slacum, for compensation for services, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill granting a portion of the public lands, for the purposes therein expressed, to the Mississippi and Rock River Canal Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which had been referred the joint resolution from the House for the relief of the heirs of Charles Brown, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill to quiet the titles of bona fide purchasers under Spanish grants, permits, and orders of survey; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the presentment of the grand jury of the district court of South Carolina, in favor of an increase of compensation to the officers of said court; and the memorial of the executors of James Rody; which was agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the improvement of the harbor of Michigan City, made a report thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the plan of the works for the improvement of the harbor at Michigan City shall be such as may be approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of James Radcliff; which was agreed to.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Irvine Shubrick, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the inquiry into the expediency of making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road to the Mississippi river, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to cause an estimate to be made of the sums that will be necessary to complete the construction of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to the Mississippi river, and of the additional amount that will be required to extend the same to the city of Jefferson, in the State of Missouri; designating the cost of the same in each State, respectively, and the aggregate sum that will be necessary to cover the whole expense; showing, as far as practicable, the separate cost of locating and grading said road in each State, for the construction of bridges and macadamizing the same, with the relative amounts that will probably be expended in the original construction of said work, and in making necessary repairs during the progress of the same, and before its completion, for the purpose of enabling the Senate to judge whether it will not be advisable, both as it regards the interest of the United States and the several States more immediately interested in the construction of said road, to make an appropriation sufficient to complete the same, payable in annual installments to the several States respectively, within the limits of which the unfinished parts of said road are situated; upon the condition that the said States will agree to accept and apply the money thus appropriated to the objects intended, and thereafter discharge the United States from any further appropriations; and upon the further condition that the said States shall have authority, and it shall be their duty, to keep the same in good repair after its completion, and shall allow the arms and munitions of war of the General Government to pass toll-free; and that he report said estimate, when made, at the next session of Congress.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred the memorial of Lysander Spooner, praying for an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of the Maumee river, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the same; which was agreed to.

Mr. T., from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Edward B. Tippet; which was agreed to.

Mr. T., from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of M. Allen, for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the reorganization of the courts of the United States in the district of Alabama; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, after some remarks on the necessity of the speedy passage of this bill, asked that it should be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; which was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the memorial of the Plum Island Bridge and Turnpike Company, praying compensation for a bridge destroyed by the erection of a breakwater by the Government, reported a bill for its relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to report to the Senate whether or not Fort Armstrong, on Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, has been abandoned as a military post by the troops of the United States; and if so, what disposition has been made of the fortifications and public buildings of that place; whether any order has been issued from the War Department to remove from the occupancy of the said island any of the citizens of Illinois; and if so, under what circumstances the same was issued.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of William Whitehead, relative to making Indian Key a port of entry, be printed.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read a third time, and passed:

The bill for the relief of William H. Robertson, Samuel H. Garrow, and J. W. Simonton;

The bill for the relief of William B. Ferguson and sureties;

The bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to establish branches of the Mint of the United States," approved March 3, 1835;

The bill to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," passed April 18, 1836;

The bill for the relief of Henry Wilson, concerning purchases of certain land in Arkansas;

The bill for the relief of Peter Bargy, jr.; and

The joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made.

PUBLIC DEPOSITS.

On the motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the message from the President of the United States, in answer to the resolutions submitted by Mr. RIVES, in relation to the transactions between the Government and the United States Bank in negotiating the sale of the bonds of the bank, &c., were taken up for consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT addressed the Senate at length in defense of the course of the officers of the Government in the transaction; and was replied to by Mr. RIVES. Pending the discussion,

The Senate adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 25, 1839.

The House then resumed the unfinished business of yesterday morning, being the case of Samuel Lewis, the question being on the motion to recommit, with instructions, by Mr. EVERETT, as stated in another column.

Mr. ADAMS concluded his remarks, and was followed in reply by Mr. MORRIS of Ohio; when, on motion of Mr. POPE, the whole subject was laid on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. DARLINGTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Bennett.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, moved to recommit the light-house bill to the Committee on Commerce; which motion was opposed by Messrs. CHAMBERS and ADAMS, and supported by the mover and Mr. CAMBRELENG, when it was agreed to—ayes 82, noes 57.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Menz Gillespie, late a soldier in the Army of the United States.

Mr. LOOMIS, from the same committee, reported a bill granting to the Portage Canal Company aid in the construction of their canal.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Elias Walton.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petition of William Patrick and Thomas Kelley.

Mr. LOOMIS, from the Committee on Public Lands, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Isaac Morrow and others.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the House, proposing to modify the law regulating postage, so as to authorize all public newspapers to be carried free of postage within the limits of the counties where printed; also, the resolution proposing to abolish postage on newspapers and periodicals; also, the resolution proposing to conform the rates of postage to the recommendations of the Postmaster General; also, the resolution proposing to restrict the franking privilege.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Joel Beaman.

Mr. LEADBETTER, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John S. Burnett.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of John Norris, of Pennsylvania, and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his papers.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Francis Rivaud.

Mr. EVERETT, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John McClenahan.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to restore jurisdiction to the district courts of the northern district of New York, and to regulate said courts.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Hawes, deceased.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill making appropriations for the defense of the northern and western frontier.

Also, a joint resolution making it the duty of the Attorney General of the United States to examine into the titles of land purchased by the United States for the purpose of erecting thereon armories and other public works, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and its further consideration postponed till Tuesday next.

Also, a bill to amend the act of 2d July, 1838, to provide for the better protection of the western frontier, &c., and also so much of the Army appropriation bill as provides for the removal of the troops from Fort Gibson, &c.; which, having been read twice, Mr. McK. moved its engrossment, but after some remarks from Mr. MERCER and Mr. YELL, the hour elapsed before the motion was decided, and the House passed to the orders of the day.

Mr. PICKENS, on leave, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Colonel Robert D. Wainwright.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 14th instant, copies of proceedings of two courts-martial, ordered on certain charges brought by Commodore Elliott against Lieutenant C. D. Hunter, upon which the latter was acquitted; together with copies of charges preferred by Lieutenant Hunter against Commodore Elliott.

Mr. LINCOLN, on leave, presented to the House a communication from Commodore Elliott, explanatory of the circumstances upon which Lieutenant Hunter founds his complaints against him; which communication, in connection with that of the Secretary, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that the House go into committee on the Private Calendar.

After some conversation,

Mr. THOMAS (the rules having been suspended for that purpose) moved the adoption of the following amendment to the rules, submitted by him some time since:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended by adding to the 20th rule the words following:

And on the first and third Friday of each month the Calendar of private bills shall be called over, and the bills, to the passage of which no objection shall be made, shall be first considered and disposed of—private bills from the Senate having a preference over private bills of the House.

Mr. T. now modified his resolution, so as to read: "the first and fourth Fridays."

Mr. EVANS briefly opposed it.

Mr. TOUCEY demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The House then went into committee (Mr. McKENNA in the chair) on a large number of private bills. Those giving rise to debate were laid aside, not to be reported.

The committee reported to the House numerous bills, without amendment; which were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, January 26, 1839.

Mr. GRANT, Mr. KEIM, and Mr. DOWNING, on leave, presented petitions.

[Mr. KEIM presented the petition of John Vanderslice, son of Henry Vanderslice, asking payment of a certificate from Quartermaster General, for forage supplied to the American Army in 1780, by his father; which, on motion, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.]

Mr. GRANT presented the petition of Edmund Curtis and eight hundred others, citizens of the county of Oswego, New York, praying Congress to repeal or essentially modify the bill passed at the last session, known as the neutrality law; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.]

Mr. BOULDIN, on leave, presented certain resolutions of the corporate authorities of the city of Washington; which, on his motion, were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRONSON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to provide for the erection of public buildings in the Territory of Florida.

Also, a resolution proposing to set apart Monday and Tuesday, the 11th and 12th days of February, for the consideration of territorial business, and bills relating to the Territories, and that they have preference over all other business on those days.

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved to insert the words "on Monday, after the States have been called for resolutions;" which was agreed to.

The resolution was then concurred in—ayes 107, noes not counted.

Mr. FRY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Chauncey Wright.

Mr. BOND, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of James B. Wright.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund.

Also, with a similar amendment, Senate bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi her two per cent. fund.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations for improving the Alleghany river from the mouth of Olean.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill to provide for the erection of a fire-proof building for the use of the Department of War, and sundry documents from the Secretary of War, in relation to the estimated cost thereof; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. ADAMS, from the joint committee of the two Houses on the Smithsonian bequest, moved that certain documents in relation thereto be printed.

Mr. A. also reported a joint resolution authorizing the employment of a clerk, and to have such papers printed as they deemed necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill extending the provisions of the amendatory act of October 14, 1837, providing for the payment of horses lost or destroyed in the service of the United States, and moved its engrossment; but, after some conversation, it was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COLES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Joel Henry Dyer.

Mr. EWING, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Elizabeth Jones.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Ellen West.

Mr. MORGAN, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of William Meade.

Mr. PLUMER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Charles Scott.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Moses E. Levy.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, from the Committee on Commerce, made unfavorable reports upon the petitions of John H. Russell, Levi Eldridge, and Nathan Smith.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the House proposing to inquire into the expediency of so regulating the postage as to receive money of the United States, and dispense with fractional parts of cents.

Also, on motion of Mr. C., the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of John Sargent and Samuel Martin.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported an amendment to the "bill imposing a duty on starch;" which was referred to the same Committee of the Whole as had charge of the bill.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

The SPEAKER announced the unfinished business of the morning hour to be the motion of Mr. HAYNES to print ten thousand extra copies of the report made by Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, on the state of the Treasury.

Mr. McKENNA moved to postpone the question till Tuesday next, on account of the absence of Mr. SERGEANT, (that gentleman being entitled to the floor,) who was engaged this morning in the Supreme Court.

Mr. ADAMS remarked that this was a very important document, and he saw no reason why it should be delayed being printed and placed before the people.

Mr. McKENNA again explained as before. Mr. HAYNES said he recognized no right in any one to absent himself from that House, unless from unavoidable illness. He considered the public interest paramount to everything else.

Mr. GRANT then demanded the previous question.

Mr. MITCHELL moved the reading of the report; which was lost.

Mr. POTTS moved a call of the House; which was lost.

The House refused to second the demand for the previous question—ayes 71, noes 73; and the question of postponement until Tuesday was discussed further by Messrs. NAYLOR, McKENNA, HAYNES, TILLINGHAST, PICKENS, BIDDLE, and CRAIG, when the hour elapsed, and the subject lies over.

Sundry bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to the appropriate standing committees.

LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

The Tennessee land bill, from the Senate, being taken up and read twice,

Mr. SHIELDS moved to postpone its consideration till Tuesday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to refer it to the select committee of twenty-six on the public lands.

The former motion having precedence, was put, and agreed to, and the bill ordered to be printed.

Mr. YELL, on leave, submitted an amendment he intended to submit to the bill when it came up, and it was ordered to be printed.

PETERS, MOORE, AND COMPANY.

The bill for the relief of Peters, Moore, & Co. and others came up on the motion to lay it on the table.

This motion was now negatived, and Mr. CASEY moved to recommit the bill to the Post Office Committee, with instructions so to amend it as to cover all similar cases.

Mr. CONNOR solicited Mr. CASEY to withdraw his amendment; whereupon

Mr. CASEY said he could not withdraw his proposition to recommit to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions. The claim proposed to be settled by this bill was, for anything he knew, a just claim, and, as such, he had no objection; but his only wish was to have the bill so amended as to embrace the cases of some of his constituents, who, as he understood, had been ruined by their contracts with the Post Office Department, and whose just claims that Department had refused to allow. He repeated, he only wished all just claims treated alike. If they were just, they should be allowed, if not, let them be rejected.

The motion being divided, after some discussion between Messrs. CASEY, CONNOR, HALL, CHAPMAN, and McKENNA,

Mr. CHAMBERS, in order to reach other claims, made a motion he said he had never made in a legislative body before, namely, demanding the previous question; but he withdrew it at the earnest request of

Mr. POTTER, who addressed the House in support of the bill for a short time, and then renewed Mr. CHAMBERS's motion; which was agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded, there being, on a division—ayes 76, noes 52; and the main question on the passage of the bill was ordered.

Mr. HOWARD said, that desiring to record his name against the bill, though he believed the claimants entitled to relief, he objected to the mode. He would, therefore, ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—ayes 62, nays 89.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. CHAMBERS immediately moved a vote of reconsideration, for the purpose of giving its friends an opportunity of moving to recommit it; which motion was briefly discussed by Messrs. HOWARD and CONNOR; when

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the previous question; which prevailed.

The rejection was reconsidered, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

HEIRS OF GEORGE GIBSON.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel George Gibson, deceased, on its passage, was taken up, and opposed by Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the bill was laid on the table.

HEIRS OF T. P. HARRISON:

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas P. Harrison, came up on a motion to reconsider its rejection on the 15th of June.

After some remarks from Messrs. HALL and TALIAFERRO,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question; but withdrew it at the suggestion of

Mr. TALIAFERRO, who further spoke in support of the claim, and concluded by moving the previous question, which was seconded, and the question being upon reconsidering, it was determined in the negative.

So the rejection of the bill was again affirmed.

JOSIAH STRONG AND SAMUEL REDDICK.

The bill for the relief of Josiah Strong and Samuel Reddick, being upon its passage,

Mr. TAYLOR stated that Samuel Reddick, since the bill was reported, had died, and asked leave so to amend the bill as to make it read for the benefit of Josiah Strong only.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, it was laid upon the table.

JAMES BAILEY.

The bill for the relief of James Bailey was taken up on its passage, when it was advocated by Messrs. WHITTLESEY and MALLORY, when Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to lay this bill also on the table, but withdrew it, at the request of Mr. WHITTLESEY; but no quorum voting upon several divisions and counts,

Mr. POPE moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in till one hundred and thirty-two members had answered to their names, when it was dispensed with, and Mr. WHITTLESEY withdrawing his motion,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, renewed that before made by him, to lay the bill on the table, and it prevailed—ayes 62, noes 60.

So the bill was laid on the table.

At a subsequent stage, Mr. PARRIS moved to reconsider this vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to lay this motion on the table; which was agreed to—ayes 70, noes 53.

GABRIEL WRIGHT.

The joint resolution for the relief of Gabriel Wright, of New York, was read the third time and passed.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read the third time and passed:

A bill for the relief of James Moor;
A bill for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Safford, of New Hampshire, deceased;

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, transmitting a statement of the accounts of the Commonwealth, Franklin, and Lafayette banks, of Boston, and an exhibit of the indebtedness of the said institutions to the United States, and in what way the same is secured; which communication, on the motion of Mr PETRIKIN, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, the House adjourned till Monday, at ten o'clock.

IN SENATE.

Monday, January 28, 1839.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Treasury Department, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 20th of December last, presenting a comparative view of the quantity of gold coins now in the United States, with the circulation of the late Bank of the United States.

Mr. BENTON observed that, on looking at this document, he found that the quantity of gold now in the country was greater than the circulation of the United States Bank, even in the times of its greatest expansion. It was important that the facts showed in this report should be extensively known through the country; and for this purpose he would move for the printing of five thousand extra copies.

This motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT presented the petition of William L. Meredith, asking compensation for the revolutionary services of his late father, and for money advanced by him; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of sundry owners, masters, engineers, and other officers of steamboats, praying the establishment of a board of engineers to inquire into the character and qualifications of all persons desiring employment in that capacity; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LINN said he held in his hand a memorial by Charles L. Flishman, a naturalized citizen of the United States, on the subject of the culture of the beet root. The memorial (Mr. L. said) was a remarkably well written and scientific production; and the author had been favorably spoken of by Mr. Ellsworth, the Commissioner of the Patent Office, under whom he held an official station, as a gentleman of talents and learning. From a cursory glance Mr. L. had given to the memorial, he had no doubt but that every word of it was true.

Mr. L. then presented the memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS observed that he had had an opportunity of reading the document that had just been presented by the Senator from Missouri; and viewing it as one of more than ordinary importance, he thought that more than the usual number of copies ought to be printed. Mr. D. accordingly moved for the printing of five thousand additional copies; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. LINN also presented the following memorial from citizens of the Oregon Territory:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned, settlers of the Columbia river, beg leave to represent to your honorable body, that our settlement, begun in the year 1832, has hitherto prospered beyond the most sanguine expectations of its first projectors. The products of our fields have amply justified the most flattering descriptions of the fertility of the soil, while the facilities which it affords for rearing cattle are, perhaps, exceeded by those of no country in North America. The people of the United States, we believe, are not generally apprised of the extent of valuable country west of the Rocky mountains. A large portion of the territory from the Columbia river south, to the boundary line between the United States and the Mexican Republic, and extending from the coast of the Pacific about two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles to the interior, is either well supplied with timber or adapted to pasturage or agriculture. The fertile valleys of the Wallamette and Umpqua are varied with prairies and woodland, and intersected by abundant lateral streams, presenting facilities for machinery. Perhaps no country, of the same latitude, is favored with a climate so mild. The winter rains, it is true, are an objection; but they are generally preferred to the snows and intense cold which prevails in the northern parts of the United States. The ground is seldom covered with snow, nor does it ever remain but a few hours.

We need hardly allude to the commercial advantages of the Territory. Its happy position for trade with China, India, and the western coasts of America, will be readily recognized. The growing importance, however, of the islands of the Pacific is not so generally known and appreciated. As these islands progress in civilization, their demand for the produce of more northern climates will increase. Nor can any country supply them with beef, flour, &c., on terms so advantageous as this. A very successful effort has been recently made at the Sandwich Islands in the cultivation of coffee and the sugar cane. A colony here will, in time, thence easily derive these articles and other tropical products in exchange for the produce of their own labor. We have thus briefly alluded to the natural resources of the country, and to its external relations. They are, in our opinion, strong inducements for the Government of the United States to take formal and speedy possession. We urge this step as promising to the general interests of the nation. But the advantages it may confer upon us, and the evils it may avert from our posterity, are incalculable.

Our social intercourse has thus far been prosecuted with reference to feelings of honor, to the feeling of dependence on the Hudson's Bay Company, and to their moral influence. Under this state of things, we have thus far prospered, but we cannot hope that it will continue. The agricultural and other resources of the country cannot fail to induce emigration and commerce. As our settlement begins to draw its supplies through other channels, the feeling of dependence upon the Hudson's Bay Company, to which we have alluded as one of the safeguards of our social intercourse, will begin to diminish. We are anxious when we imagine what will be, what must be, the condition of so mixed a community, free from all legal restraint, and superior to that moral influence which has hitherto been the pledge of our safety.

Our interests are identified with those of the country of our adoption. We flatter ourselves that we are the germ of a great State, and are anxious to give an early tone to the moral and intellectual character of its citizens. We are fully aware, too, that the destinies of our posterity will be intimately affected by the character of those who emigrate to the country. The territory must populate. The Congress of the United States must say by whom. The natural resources of the country, with a well-judged civil code, will invite a good community. But a good community will hardly emigrate to a country which promises no protection for life or property. Inquiries have already been submitted to some of us for information of the country. In return, we can only speak of a country highly favored of nature. We can boast of no civil code. We can promise no protection but the ulterior resort of self-defense. By whom, then, shall our country be populated? By the reckless and unprincipled adventurer, not by the hardy and enterprising pioneer of the West. By the Botany-bay refugee, by the renegade of civilization from the Rocky Mountains, by the profligate, deserted seamen from Polynesia, and the unprincipled sharpers from Spanish America. Well are we assured that it will cost the Government of the United States more to reduce elements so discordant to social order, than to promote our permanent peace and prosperity by a timely action of Congress. Nor can we suppose that so vicious a population could be relied on in case of a rupture between the United States and any other Power.

Our intercourse with the natives among us, guided much by the same influence which has promoted harmony among ourselves, has been generally pacific. But the same causes which will interrupt harmony among ourselves, will also interrupt our friendly relations with the natives. It is, therefore, of primary importance, both to them and us, that the Government should take energetic measures to secure the execution of all laws affecting Indian trade and the intercourse of white men and Indians. We have thus briefly shown that the security of our persons and our property, the hopes and destinies of our children are involved in the objects of our petition. We do not presume to suggest the manner in which the country should be occupied by the Government, nor the extent to which our settlement should be encouraged. We confide in the wisdom of our national legislators, and leave the subject to their candid deliberations, and your petitioners will ever pray.

J. L. WHITCOMB, and thirty-five others.

March 16, 1838.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the memorial was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition and papers of Ezra Thurber, praying that a suit instituted against him by the United States may be dismissed; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the petition of the officers of the revenue cutter Dexter; and

Mr. NILES presented a memorial from the officers of the revenue cutter Wolcott, both praying that the Navy pension laws may be extended to the revenue service; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN presented two memorials from citizens of Ohio, one on the subject of the burning of the steamboat Caroline, and the other praying for the repeal or modification of the neutrality law of the last session; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin, setting forth the claims of that Territory to the jurisdiction of all the country north of a line drawn due west from the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, and for the passage of a law establishing that as the southern boundary line of Wisconsin.

Mr. N. said the memorial had relation to a subject of great importance both to the State of Illinois and the Territory of Wisconsin. It had a bearing also upon a portion of territory which had been annexed to the State of Michigan. He had been requested by the respectable Delegate from Wisconsin to propose the reference of the memorial to a select committee. It had, however, occurred to him, that, as the subject was of a legal and constitutional nature, the appropriate committee to consider it was the Committee on the Judiciary. He therefore moved that the memorial be referred to that committee, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. N. presented another memorial from the same Legislative Assembly, requesting appropriations for harbors on the western shore of Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. N. also presented a third memorial from the same Legislative Assembly, requesting the extinguishment of the title of the Menomonee Indians to lands within the Territory of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of the Mayor and Aldermen of the city of St. Louis, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of their harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of certain officers of the line of the Army, praying that their pay may be made equal to that of the officers of the staff; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TIPTON presented the petition of O. C. Ward, praying for a post road from Lima, in La-grange county, Indiana, to Therman, in St. Joseph county, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. T. also presented the memorial of citizens of the States bordering on the Ohio river, praying that competent engineers be appointed to examine the surveys made by the Jeffersonville and New Albany Company, and that such aid may be granted as may be deemed proper; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Peoria, Knox, Henry, and Rock Island counties, Illinois, praying for the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. Y. also, presented a communication from the General Land Office, on the subject of the surveys of the public lands in Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Illinois, asking Congress for the donation of township five north, fourteen west, upon the river Embarrass, which was not sectionized when the other public lands in that part of the State were surveyed, in consequence of being inundated and drowned, and in which situation it still remains. Mr. R. said, in presenting the resolution, he considered it proper to state, in hopes of a favorable consideration of the subject, that this township, not having been surveyed was in consequence of its inundation and supposed worthlessness; that the surveys in that part of the State were made many years ago, and had been in market upwards of twenty years; much of them were yet unsold; that this township, as it now is, and most probably will continue to be, is utterly valueless to the Government. The State, however, by draining, may be able to convert it to some useful purpose, and, at the same time, greatly improve the health of the neighborhood in which it is situated. With its avails it is proposed to improve the navigation of the river upon which it lies—a river already navigable for a short distance, and capable of being made so some hundred or more of miles—the upper part of which runs through an interior and very fertile portion of the State, now rapidly settling and advancing in estimation. He would not now go into the subject of the General Government encouraging and aiding to drain the swamps and inundated lands upon many of the river bottoms in Illinois, as that subject, in a specific form, had been already brought to the notice of the Senate, and upon which he hoped soon to see the liberal action of Congress, which he felt assured could be had greatly to the benefit and interest of all concerned, and without the expense of a dollar to Government, by a donation of the lands to be reclaimed.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. LINN, from the select committee to which was referred the bill to authorize the occupation of the mouth of the Columbia river, reported the same without amendment, and, after a few remarks, moved that the bill be made the order of the day for this day week; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to which had been referred the amendments of the House to the bill to renew the patent of Thomas Blanchard, made a report thereon, recommending that the Senate concur in said amendments.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise the claims of the United States against John W. Karney and William McFarland and sureties; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill making further provisions in relation to the Navy pension fund; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of Samuel Mackey, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SEVIER submitted an amendment to the bill for the relief of Matthew Arbuckle, embracing all cases similar to it, which he gave notice he should offer when said bill came up.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Margaret Barnes;
A bill for the relief of Mary Snow;
A bill for the relief of Mary Tracy; and A bill for the relief of Lemuel White; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MORRIS, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of Camilla Brown, widow of the late General Brown, reported the same without amendment, recommending its rejection.

On motion of Mr. M., the report accompanying said bill was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Roger Jones, Adjutant General of the Army; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LYON, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Daniel Marsack; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of notice given, obtained leave and introduced a bill to provide for the defense of the western frontier from the mouth of the Sabine to Fort Snelling; which was read twice and referred.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the petition and papers of Alphonso Wetmore, on the files of the last session, together with an additional document just presented, were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. L. also moved that the papers in relation to the claim of certain Missouri volunteers be again referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the petition and papers of Britton Evans, of Philadelphia, one of the Florida volunteers, on the files of the last session, praying compensation for property lost by shipwreck, was again referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, the joint resolution from the House authorizing the Joint Committee on the Smithsonian bequest to employ a clerk, and to order certain printing, was taken up and concurred in.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bills for the relief of John J. Bulow and Joseph Hernandez were taken from the table, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

REPEAL OF SALT DUTY.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate took up the request made by him for leave to introduce a bill for the repeal of the salt duty, and the fishing bounties and allowances dependent thereon.

Mr. DAVIS then addressed the Senate, in reply to the remarks of Mr. BENTON, when presenting the bill on Thursday last.

Mr. BENTON replied to Mr. DAVIS at length; after which,

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, the whole subject was postponed till to-morrow.

A number of bills from the House were read twice, and referred to appropriate committees.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The PRESIDENT communicated a message from the President of the United States, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 22d instant, in relation to the northeastern boundary; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

MADISON PAPERS.

Mr. WALL, from the Joint Committee on the Library, which had been authorized to contract for the printing of the Madison papers, reported that they had contracted with Messrs. Langtree & O'Sullivan for the printing thereof. The report was ordered to be printed.

After a short executive session, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 28, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read,

Mr. HAYNES rose and remarked that one of the pending resolutions on the President's message, that on taking the census, was of very great importance, and it being still in Committee of the Whole, Mr. H. hoped the House would consent to go into committee thereon.

Objection being made, Mr. H. moved a suspension of the rules; but it was rejected.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. CONNOR asked leave to present a petition, but it was objected to.

Mr. DOTY, on leave, presented the following petitions: From the inhabitants of Rock county, for a harbor at Southport; from A. J. Irwin, for confirmation to a tract of land at Green Bay; from citizens of New York, for a harbor at Racine; from citizens of Southport, for an appropriation for a harbor at Southport; memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin, praying for the extinguishment of the title of the Menomonee Indians, in the Territory of Wisconsin; also praying the confirmation of the title to lots one, two, and three, in the town of Milwaukee; memorial praying for the passage of a law granting pre-emption to settlers on the line of the Milwaukee and Rock river canal; memorial for the relief of the owners or proprietors of mineral lots in Wisconsin; memorial praying for a donation of land for the improvement of the navigation of the Pecatonick river; memorial for the improvement of the Mississippi, Wisconsin, and Platte rivers; memorial for the improvement of the Neenah (Fox) and Rock rivers; memorial for the settlement of the claims of Wisconsin for jurisdiction over the country north of a line drawn due west from the southerly bend or extremity of Lake Michigan.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. GRANT gave notice that on to-morrow he would move for leave to introduce a bill to provide for certain harbors, and for the removal of certain obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, during the year 1839.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, in pursuance of notice, and on leave given, introduced a bill to allow a drawback of duties on imported hemp, when manufactured into cordage and exported; which was, on motion of Mr. T., referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. JENIFER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to provide a free bridge across the Eastern Branch of the river Potomac, in the city of Washington.

Also, a bill to incorporate the Washington Manual Labor School and Male Orphan Asylum Society, of the city of Washington, and District of Columbia.

Also, a joint resolution providing that from the 1st day of January, 1839, the physician to the penitentiary of the District of Columbia be allowed the sum of $600 as a permanent annual salary.

Also, without amendment, Senate bill making an appropriation for the support of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing the naval monument in the front of the Capitol to be removed to some more suitable and appropriate place.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from the town of Frankfort, in the State of Maine, to the town of Munroe, in the said State.

Mr. REED offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House, early at its next session, the amount of compensation, whether as fees or otherwise, which has been received by each of the district attorneys, clerks, and marshals of the United States, as fees or otherwise, as officers of the Government, during the year 1839; and to that end that said attorneys, clerks, and marshals be directed to keep and number an exact account of all moneys, &c., received.

The resolution would regularly lie over one day, but

Mr. REED asked the House to consider it at this time.

Objection having been made,

Mr. REED moved a suspension of the rules; which was agreed to.

The resolution was considered and adopted.

On motion of Mr. GRENNELL, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of extending the benefits of five years' half pay, now allowed by law to the widows and orphans of officers and soldiers of the militia and volunteers who die in the service of the United States, to the widows and orphans of officers and soldiers of the regular Army, who have died, or shall die in the service, or in consequence of wounds received while in the line of duty.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Massachusetts, rose and said that he had received a letter from Samuel Etheridge, Esq., of Massachusetts, stating that he had heretofore preferred charges against Captain Elliott, of the Navy, and requesting that a call might be made on the Department in relation to said charges, and Mr. F. stated that, in conformity with this request, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish this House with certain charges heretofore preferred by Samuel Etheridge, of Massachusetts, against Captain J. D. Elliott, of the Navy of the United States, and to furnish the reasons, if any, why the Department has not heretofore ordered a court of inquiry to sit upon said charges against said Elliott.

The resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. CUSHING said that four weeks ago he offered a resolution, or series of resolutions, of inquiry in regard to sundry points in the relations of Great Britain and the United States, which lay over under the rule. He wished to-day, instead of exercising his privilege to offer a new resolution on some other subject, to call up the former, and have it passed; engaging for himself to waive all debate on the subject at the present time.

No objection being made, the resolutions were taken up; and being modified by the mover, and amended at the suggestion of Mr. BRONSON, passed as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House information touching the following particulars in the territorial relations of the United States and Great Britain on this Continent:

1. The correspondence, if any, which has been had between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain, or the military or civil authorities of either, in relation to the troubles in the British Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and to alleged violations of neutrality on the part whether of Great Britain or the United States, or any of the officers, subjects, or citizens of each.

2. The correspondence had, or measures taken by the Executive, if any, regarding citizens of the United States made prisoners of war at any time in any of the insurrectionary movements of Upper or Lower Canada.

3. Whether the Government of Great Britain has made reparation for the seizure and destruction of the steamboat Caroline, within the waters of the United States, and the murder of American citizens on board the same, by a band of armed invaders from the province of Upper Canada, acting under the orders and authority of the colonial government of said province; and whether any and what negotiation or correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain has taken place on that subject; and, if so, what is the present state of such negotiation.

4. Whether the Government of the United States has entered into negotiations with that of Great Britain for the purpose of arresting and preventing the further distribution of presents and payment of war subsidies by the latter Government to the Indian tribes within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of the United States; and, if so, what has been the result of the said negotiations.

5. Whether the Government of the United States has given to that of Great Britain the stipulated notice to annul and abrogate the convention of the 8th of September, 1827, under cover of which, and of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, the Hudson's Bay Company has proceeded, with permission or by connivance of the Government of Great Britain, to establish military posts in the territories of the United States beyond the Rocky mountains.

6. Whether the Government of the United States has taken any measures, and if any, what, to adjust, settle, and mark the boundaries between the United States and the British provinces in North America, from St. Mary's falls, between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, and so northwardly and westwardly along the frontier of the State of Michigan and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, to the Rocky mountains.

7. What correspondence, if any, the Government of the United States has had with that of Great Britain, or any of its authorities or officers, or with the government of the State of Maine, in regard to the late survey or investigation of the northeastern boundary line of the United States by the government of said State, and the present conditions of the negotiations relating to said boundary.

8. Whether any correspondence has recently passed between the British and American Governments relative to the free navigation of the navigable rivers coterminous to the United States and the British possessions in North America, or of navigable rivers running, in part or in whole, through the territories of both Governments; and if so, the result of the same.

9. Whether the public authorities of Upper Canada, or any of them, have undertaken to interdict or restrict the ordinary intercourse between said province and the contiguous parts of the United States; and if so, by what law or pretense of right; and whether said interdict or restriction is consistent with the treaties subsisting between the United States and Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether the accounts of David Henshaw, late collector of the port of Boston and Charlestown, in Massachusetts, have been settled with the Treasury of the United States; and if so, whether any, and if any, what, amount of credit was allowed him for money deposited in the Commonwealth Bank of Boston, in the name of said collector, and which remained on deposit at the time of the insolvency and failure of said bank, either to the credit of said collector or of the United States; and whether any sum, and if any, what sum, has been passed to the credit of said collector on account of payments or advancements to officers of the customs in said port of Boston and Charlestown for salaries, fees, or otherwise in anticipation of appropriation, and for which no provision was made by law; and whether any credits have been allowed to said collector for any assignment of bank stock, transfer, or charge of bank deposits, or for property, real or personal, by sale or assignment, for which the Treasury of the United States has not already realized the nominal amount for which it was so sold or assigned in specie value. And if the accounts of said collector are still open and outstanding, that the Secretary report to this House the reasons why the same are not closed and settled.

On motion of Mr. HALEY, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish a copy of the report and drawings in reference to the harbor of Stonington, in Connecticut, together with any additional information in reference to the improvement of said harbor.

Mr. ADAMS presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That every member of the House of Representatives of the United States ought, before taking his seat therein, to produce at the Clerk's table, or to deposit in the Clerk's office, the credentials by virtue of which he claims his seat; and in all cases of contested election, no member ought to be permitted to vote until the House, upon a report from the standing Committee of Elections, or by the vote of the majority of the members present, being a quorum of the House, shall have decided which of the claimants is entitled to the contested seat.

Mr. ADAMS explained that he had offered this resolution in consequence of the disuse of a practice which had formerly existed in this House, and which he believed to be the practice of every other deliberative body. It was, that every member who was here as the Representative of the people should produce the credentials by virtue of which he claimed his seat. This practice had been adopted at the first organization of the Government, and had been continued until within the last eight or ten years. He did not exactly know when it was first disused, but since that time every gentleman who thought proper to do so had come and taken his seat without having presented any evidence of his being entitled thereto. Mr. A. did not intend to debate this resolution himself, nor was he aware that there was any disposition to contest the principle. It was one the operation of which might be of very great importance at the commencement of the next session of Congress. He hoped the resolution would be disposed of now.

Objection having been made, Mr. BRONSON moved a suspension of the rules; and, after some desultory conversation, the question was taken, and the motion to suspend the rule was negatived—ayes 86, noes 62; not two thirds.

And Mr. PRENTISS having signified his intention to debate the resolution, it lies over one day by the rule.

Mr. EVERETT submitted the following resolution; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law:

1. That the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, in office on the last day of the last session of any Congress, shall remain in office until the organization of the House of Representatives of the succeeding Congress.

2. That it shall be the duty of the Clerk to receive and file all certificates of election transmitted to him by the Executives of the several States, in the succeeding Congress.

3. That it shall be the duty of the said Clerk to make a roll of the members who, from such certificates, or when no certificates are returned, from credentials from the Executives of the States presented by persons claiming to be members of such Congress, appear to have been elected members of said Congress.

4. That the said Clerk shall, at twelve o'clock m., on the day appointed for the meeting of such Congress, call the members so enrolled to order, who shall then proceed to elect a Speaker and Clerk for the time being.

5. Providing for the mode of taking testimony in case of contested elections, and that the same be filed with the Clerk on or before the second Monday of the session.

6. That the said House, when so organized, shall appoint a Committee of Elections by ballot, or viva voce, as a majority shall determine, to consist of thirteen members, who shall be sworn to the faithful discharge of their duty.

7. That said committee proceed forthwith to examine and report on all contested elections; and that the persons contesting may be heard before the House by themselves and counsel; and which shall decide thereon without further debate.

8. That after the decision of all the cases of contested election the House shall proceed to elect a Speaker, Clerk, and other officers of the House for the Congress; that if the election of Speaker shall result in the choice of another person the standing committees shall be appointed anew.

Mr. EVERETT submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to inform this House,

1. What was the practice of his Department at and prior to the 4th of March, 1829, relative to the mode of filing and keeping the letters and communications received; particularly whether a register of them was made, and whether they were kept on file in the order of consecutive dates, with numbers and letters corresponding with such register; and whether, since that time, a change has been made in the mode of filing and keeping the same; and if so, what, and when, and by whom made, and what is now the practice of the Department in these respects.

2. Whether it is now the practice of the Department to keep and preserve on the regular files of the Department, or otherwise, and in what manner, all letters and papers received having relation to the official business of the Department, and to preserve in the letter-books of the Department, or otherwise, copies of all letters and communications from the Department.

3. What was the practice of the Department at and prior to the 4th of March, 1829, relative to communicating to postmasters against whom charges had been made, or for whose removal application had been made, copies of such charges, or the substance of the same, or copies of such applications, and of the statement or evidence received in support of such charge or application, or any notice thereof before proceeding to act thereon; and whether it was the practice to receive counter statements or testimony on behalf of such postmasters; and also whether it was the practice of the Department, in cases which did not require immediate action, to appoint an agent to take testimony, or to investigate the truth of the charges or grounds of the application; and whether any change has been made in the practice of the Department in these respects; and if so, what, and when, and by whom made, and what is now the practice of the Department in these respects.

4. Whether it is now a rule or practice of the Department to refuse to postmasters who have been removed on charges made, or on the application of others, copies of such charges, or copies of the statements or evidence received in support of the same, or the reason or grounds of their removal when required by such postmaster; and if so, when was such rule or practice first adopted, and by whom; and

5. The manner in which the accounts of the Department with contractors and postmasters are now kept.

Mr. ALLAN, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution, which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the law on the subject of naturalization as to exclude therefrom the privileges of natural-born citizens who are or shall be born of parents who have removed, or shall remove, from the United States, and have taken, or shall take, the oath of allegiance to the Government in which they so reside, until such person shall become naturalized like other foreigners, agreeably to the laws that now do, or hereafter may, exist on that subject.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, it was

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest, what demand has been made upon the British Government for satisfaction for the outrage committed under its authority, in burning the steamboat Caroline, and murdering our unarmed citizens on board; and what reply said Government has made to such demand; and all the correspondence on the subject of said outrage, between this Government and that, or the officers or agents of either, or the officers or agents of this Government and the President, or any of its Departments, which have not heretofore been communicated to this House.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to John Robinson, of Delaware county, New York.

Mr. GRANT presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report to this House, with all convenient dispatch, a bill making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors for the year 1839, and for certain surveys of the same, according to the estimates for those objects as submitted to this House or to the said committee during the present session, by the Department and bureaus having charge of said improvements and public works.

Mr. G. moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER decided the motion to be out of order.

Mr. GRANT took an appeal, but withdrew it. And the resolution was ordered to lie over one day.

Subsequently, Mr. GRANT moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to have his resolution considered at this time, and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. DAVIES offered a resolution providing that hereafter the daily hour of the meeting of this House shall be eleven o'clock a. m.

Objection having been made,

Mr. D. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked the yeas and nays; which were refused.

And the question having been taken, the House refused to suspend the rule.

The resolution lies over one day.

A number of motions were made to suspend the rule for the purpose of taking up for consideration resolutions heretofore offered, and now on the Speaker's table; but which were, in all instances, rejected, except as herein given to the contrary.

Mr. PALMER submitted the following joint resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter, when in any State or Territory the public lands belonging to the United States shall be reduced, by sale or otherwise, to a quantity not exceeding one sixth part of their original amount, the minimum price of the public land, within such State or Territory, shall be reduced twenty five cents per acre; and a like reduction shall take place at the end of every two years thereafter; of which several reductions the President of the United States shall, by proclamation, from time to time, give due notice, until said price shall be reduced to twenty-five cents per acre; and at the end of two years after such last reduction, all the public lands within such State or Territory shall be offered at sale, at public auction, for cash, to the highest bidder, like notice being given of such sale as is now provided by law, at which sales the States or Territories in which such lands are situated may become purchasers.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting bounty lands to the commissioned officers who served in the Army of the United States during the late war with Great Britain, and also of reviving the acts of 1816 and 1817, granting bounty lands to Canadian volunteers.

Resolved, That the second Tuesday in February next, be set apart for the consideration of House bill No. 540, entitled "A bill granting an additional quantity of land for the location of revolutionary bounty land warrants," the said bill to take precedence of all other business on that day after the morning hour.

On motion of Mr. McKENNAN, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House how long the balance of $3,702 72, reported in the account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year 1837, prepared in the office of the Register of the Treasury, against Thomas Irwin, Esq., late district attorney, and now district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, has been standing on the books of the Treasury; whether the said district attorney has presented any vouchers for the liquidation of that balance, which have been suspended; and if not, and that balance is undisputed, to state why it has not been collected.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, It was

Resolved, (the Senate concurring herein,) That the Joint Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of providing a digested index to the whole series of Journals of the House, since the organization of the Government, alphabetically pointing to each subject-matter, with the year, volume, and page of the record.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the aggregate amount paid to all persons who have, since 1829, been concerned in negotiating treaties with the Indians, together with the names of such persons, and the sums respectively received by them in the way of per diem, mileage, and extra charges, and under what authority. And, also, if any of the clerks in the State Treasury, War, or Navy Departments, or any of the bureaus or offices thereof, are charged with the disbursement of public funds, and if so, what amount of compensation is allowed to each for the performance of this extra service, and what security is required of them for its faithful performance.

Mr. MERCER submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to lay before the House of Representatives a list of all removals from office which have occurred since the organization of the present Government of the United States, denoting the names of the persons so removed, and the title or denomination of their respective offices. Also, a similar list of all persons whose term of service having been limited, by law, to four years, have not been re-nominated; and that such list denote the date of each removal, or expiration of office, not succeeded by the re-nomination of the person whose term of service shall have so expired.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing Lenza Thomas on the pension list; and the Commissioner of Pensions furnish the committee with the documents in his possession in support of his claim for a pension.

On motion of Mr. BEIRNE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making certain changes in the carrying of the mails, and certain alterations in the mail routes, in Cahall county, Virginia, as suggested by the citizens of the said county.

Mr. PARRIS submitted the following resolution; which lies one day upon the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of further extending the provisions of the pension act of July 7, 1838, to give benefit to the widows of revolutionary pensioners who have become widows since the passage of the pension act of July 4, 1836.

Mr. McKAY submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House whether any cases of defalcation not heretofore reported to either House of Congress have occurred on the part of the public officers, in any branch of the public service under the direction of his Department; the names of such defalcators, and the amounts of the defalcations, respectively, and what proceedings have been adopted by him in each case.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to inform this House whether any of the State troops called into the service of the United States in the Cherokee country yet remain unpaid, and if so, how many, and the reasons why these claims have not sooner been settled.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies one day upon the table:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, upon what authority Lewis Cass, Minister to the Court of St. Cloud, visited France, Asia, and other foreign countries, since his appointment; and how long said Minister was absent from the court of the French King.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of Alexander Williamson, of Fredell county, North Carolina, and that the evidence on file in this House be referred to the said committee.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law of the following import, constituting the Committee of Elections:

That on the third day of the first session of each Congress, the name of that member from each State who has received the greatest majority of votes for Congress among his own delegation shall be deposited in box No. 1.

That the names of all the other members of Congress then in attendance shall be severally put in box No. 2.

That a boy under ten years old shall proceed forthwith to draw out of box No. 2 the names of ten members, which names, so drawn, shall be placed in box No. 1.

That box No. 1, then containing thirty-six ballots or names, shall be mixed, and immediately a boy under ten years old shall draw out one ballot, until the names of twelve members of Congress be so drawn; which twelve persons shall constitute the Committee of Elections.

That said committee shall thereupon be sworn by the Speaker to hear, investigate, and report truly all such contested elections as may be committed to their charge, according to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State in which the contest may or shall originate.

That the said committee shall immediately retire to their committee room, and elect their own chairman.

That in case of a vacancy in said committee, by death, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by drawing one or more names from box No. 1, until the committee be again filled.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of building a light-house on Oak Island, at the mouth of Cape Fear river; also, of placing a small light on Campbell's island, in said river.

Mr. THOMPSON submitted the following joint resolution; which, under the rules, lies over, and was ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the notes of sound specie paying banks shall hereafter be received in payment of the dues of the Government, under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by Congress.

Resolved, That the public funds shall hereafter be deposited with banks owned in whole or in part by the States where situated, and that where none such exist, with such incorporated banks as the Secretary of the Treasury may select: Provided, That when deposited with private incorporated banks, the funds of the Government are not to be used in the discounts or other business of such banks; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to contract with said banks for a stipulated compensation for the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the practicability of enlarging the rooms and giving additional light to the House Library; of the propriety of having all books and documents belonging to the House, as they pass into print, placed in the same for safe-keeping and for reference, whereby one depository will be made of the whole; of appointing the librarian by the House, and requiring him to give bond for the faithful keeping and preserving of all the printed records so to be placed in his charge.

On motion of Mr. S. WILLIAMS, the House took up for consideration the following resolution, offered by him on the 31st December:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, and the Postmaster General, be, and they are hereby, respectively, required to report and communicate to this House, as soon as practicable, what were the expenses of their respective Departments, including every item of expenditure, in the year commencing on the 4th day of March, 1828, and ending on the 3d day of March, 1829, and so on for each successive year up to the 4th of March, 1838, and from thence up to the 1st day of January, 1839, placing each item of expenditure under its proper head: and further, to report and communicate the number of clerks and other officers, of every description whatever, belonging to their respective Departments, with the salary or pay of each, in each year, separately, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1828, and so on for each successive year up to the 4th of March, 1838, and from thence up to the 1st day of January, 1839. And further, to report how much (if anything) has been allowed as extra pay to any clerk or other officer of their respective Departments, at any time within the foregoing periods, and for what services those extra allowances were made.

Mr. CRARY was opposed to the resolution in its present shape, because it would involve an inquiry which it would take six months to answer.

A motion was made by Mr. RENCHER to amend the said resolution by inserting therein the words, "the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate."

And, pending the question on the motion, The previous question was moved by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, when

A call of the House was moved by Mr. RIVES, which was decided in the negative.

The House then divided on the motion for the previous question, when it was found that a quorum was not present.

A motion was then made by Mr. BANKS that there be a call of the House.

And, the question being put, it passed in the affirmative.

The roll was then called in part; when, On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

And the House again divided on the motion for the previous question; when it was demanded by a majority of the members present.

The previous question was then put, viz: Shall the main question be now put? And passed in the negative.

And so the House determined that the main question should not now be put.

Mr. GRANTLAND presented a resolution by the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, soliciting the establishment of a weekly mail route (the mail to be carried on horseback) between Blairsville, in the county of Union, and Dahlonega, in the county of Lumpkin, by the way of Cooper's Gap in the Blue Ridge; which resolution was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHGATE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be in-

Resolved, That for the residue of this session, the daily hour to which this House shall stand adjourned be ten o'clock, a. m.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to state, in the report which may be made to the House in answer to the resolution adopted on the 14th of January, 1839, "calling for the amount of money expended annually by each Administration in the Government, from the 4th of March, 1789, to the 4th of March, 1837, with the amount of public money lost annually by defalcation of public officers," &c.; whether suits have been instituted against the several defaulting debtors, and when; and further, that he inform this House when the defaulting debtors were severally appointed and employed in the public service.

On motion of Mr. MENEFEE, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to this House a statement of the sums respectively awarded, under the act of July 13, 1832, for carrying into effect the convention with France of July 4, 1831, in favor of persons from whom sums of money were due to the United States; the amounts to which they were respectively entitled under the ratable proportions provided for by said act; the amounts respectively paid to them; the amounts respectively entered to their credit by reason of the deductions provided for in said act; why, if the fact be so, said persons did not receive the full benefit of said act, either by payment or credits on their debts to the United States; whether an agent was employed by the Treasury Department to ascertain the persons thus indebted, and if so, who he was, on what terms employed, and, if paid, to what amount, how, and by what authority; and whether all the facts necessary to enable the Secretary to make said deductions did not previously exist on the files of his Department, and were not actually furnished for that purpose by an officer thereof under his direction.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, submitted the following resolution; which was read and laid on the table one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of the Navy, War, State, and Treasury Departments be respectively directed to communicate to this House what percentage is allowed disbursing officers, in their several Departments, for the disbursement of the public money, by any regulation of the Department, and whether any officer receiving a salary fixed by law has, since the 4th day of March, 1829, been allowed a percentage as compensation for extra services, for the disbursement of the public money, the name of such officer or officers, and the amount so received by each; and that they be respectively directed to communicate to this House copies of any regulations which may have been made, under which such percentages are allowed and paid; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House any correspondence upon the subject of the money retained by William Steuben Smith, late a clerk in the Land Office, and to inform this House what was said Smith's returns, and whether the amount retained in his hands exceeded the disbursements he was required to make, or whether he failed to make the disbursements required, and withheld the money, refusing to apply it as directed; and that he also inform this House when said Smith failed or refused to pay over the money in his hands, when suit was instituted against him, and when he resigned his office, or was dismissed from the service.

On motion by Mr. CROCKETT, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to this House the amount of money already expended in the construction of the new custom-house at New York, and what amount is estimated to be necessary to complete it.

On motion of Mr. CARTER, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House, with as little delay as possible, what progress has been made in the execution of the treaties with the Chickasaw Indians of the 20th of October, 1832, and 24th of May, 1834; what amount of funds has been received by the United States in trust for said tribe of Indians, arising from the sale of their lands, and how the same has been invested, at what time, and in what stocks, and the name of the agent or agents concerned in negotiating all such investments; also, the whole amount of the expense incurred in the execution of said treaties, the amount of such expense paid by the Government, and the amount paid from the sales of the lands by said Indians; also, the name of each officer or agent employed in the execution of said treaties, the date of his appointment, the nature of the service of each of them, the time each was actually employed, as nearly as may be ascertained, the rate of compensation, and the aggregate amount paid to each.

Resolved, That the said Secretary of War be also directed to report to this House the whole number of Choctaw Indians who removed west of the Mississippi, under the superintendence of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, and the number removed in each year since the commencement of emigration; also, the name of each officer or agent employed in the execution of the several articles of said treaty, the date of his appointment, the nature and term of the service of each, the rate and the aggregate amount of compensation of each officer or agent appointed under the provisions of the act of 3d of March, 1830, entitled "An act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land, under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians," and the act of the 22d of February, 1838, amending the same; also, what progress has been made in the execution of the objects of said acts.

On motion of Mr. BELL, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House what steps have been taken by the Department, or by the agent or Solicitor of the Treasury, to collect the balance due, or claimed to be due, the United States from John Brahan, late receiver of public money at Huntsville, Alabama, or from his legal representatives; and that he communicate copies of all the correspondence, and other papers within the control of the Department, relative to said claim.

On motion of Mr. TURNEY, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to this House the number of horses, belonging to the volunteers in the service of the United States in Florida, which were turned over to the United States, and the orders under or by which they were so turned over, and by what authority said orders were made; that he also communicate the aggregate value of said horses when mustered into service, with their equipages, and also the value assessed at the time they were turned over; and that he communicate the cause of the great difference in value, and whether it was not owing to the fact that a large portion of said horses had given out, and were abandoned from want of forage. That he also communicate the number of claims for lost horses now on file, the number that have been paid, and the number yet remaining to be audited and paid, and the reason why they have not been paid before this; and whether the claims of the volunteers under the command of Major Lauderdale for lost horses have been examined by the Third Auditor, and the causes of the great delay of that officer to perform this service, and when it is likely he will examine and adjust said claims.

On motion of Mr. CHEATHAM, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a supplement to the tabular statements transmitted by him on the 4th of January, 1836, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 31st of December, 1835, exhibiting in such supplement a statement of the sums annually paid, under each material head of expenditures, from 1834 to 1839.

On motion of Mr. HARPER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to the heirs and legal representatives of James Reynolds, for a horse lost in the late war war Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. BOND, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the dates and amounts of the official bonds of the collectors and naval officers at the ports of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, together with the names of the securities of said collectors and naval officers, respectively.

On motion of Mr. LEADBETTER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the law in relation to the judiciary as to require an interchange of the duties of circuit and district judges of the United States courts, in all cases where it would be improper for them to sit on account of interest, or where parties cannot obtain a fair trial, &c.

On motion of Mr. GOODE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands, to whom is now committed a resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to authorize the State of Ohio to purchase the United States alternate sections of land on the Miami canal, in the State of Ohio, and the United States alternate sections of land on so much of the Wabash and Erie canal as lies within the State of Ohio, at $2.50 per acre, be hereby further instructed to extend their inquiries into the expediency of providing also in the same bill for the receding to the State of Ohio by the United States the right it now has to navigate said canals free of toll.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to this House the number of failures in the ordinary and express mails, distinguishing between the said mails, to and from the city of New Orleans, within the last six months, the causes of said failures, and the steps adopted by him to prevent the recurrence of such failures.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to aid in the improvement of the harbor on Lake Pontchartrain, at Port Pontchartrain, in the State of Louisiana.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House whether in his opinion, the improvements can be suspended or discontinued upon the harbors now in process of construction, without endangering the existence of the structures already begun, and without exposing the Government to a waste of the moneys already expended; what is the average progress of those harbors towards completion; and whether the interests of commerce would not be deleteriously affected by such suspension or discontinuance; and that he extend his report to those rivers whose channels are now undergoing improvement under the authority of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act of Congress entitled "An act directing the transfer of money remaining unclaimed by certain pensioners, and authorizing the payment of the same at the Treasury of the United States," approved April 6, 1838.

Mr. RARIDEN moved the following resolution; which was read, and laid on the table one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the names and rank of the officers of the Army of the United States who have been employed since July, 1834, in paying Indian annuities, or in making payment under treaty stipulation, showing the tribe or nation to whom paid, and the amount paid to each tribe, with the amount paid to such officers, either as salaries, percentage, per diem pay, mileage, transportation, or subsistence. And also, the names and residence of each individual employed since July, 1834, in the transportation of money, goods, or other property paid to the Indians, the amount of, and what property transported, the amount paid to each person so employed, distinguishing what was paid as wages, what for transportation, mileage, subsistence, or percentage, and how long each person was so employed in each case, and for what tribe or nation. And, also, the names and residence of each individual employed in removing the Indians west of the Mississippi since 1830, exclusive of the Army, together with the compensation paid to each, how long each was employed, and in what capacity, noting what was paid to each as salary, what as per diem pay, expenses incurred, or subsistence, during the time so employed. And, also, to report the names and residence of all persons employed as commissioners, or by any other name, since 1830, to investigate claims against Indians, and the names and residence of the persons employed to aid such commissioners, whether as clerks, secretaries, or attorneys, together with the location of the Indians where the services were rendered, the amount of claims investigated, the time employed, and the amount of compensation paid to each, whether as salary, per diem allowance, expenses, transportation, subsistence, or percentage; and to specify under what laws the various persons before named have been appointed to the several employs and paid.

Mr. EWING moved the following resolution; which was read, and laid on the table one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House the number, and places of payment, of agents now authorized to satisfy revolutionary and other pensions, declared payable in the State of Indiana; the compensation, if any, to which said agent or agents are, or claim to be, entitled. Also, the terms, if known at the Department, upon which the State Bank of Indiana would agree to stipulate to make all such payments, through the instrumentality of her branch banks, with all such additional information as he may possess, and deem proper, to show the trouble, loss, and delay, to which the poor pensioners, payable in said State, are now subjected, by reason of great distance from the point or points at which they can alone receive payment, and to demonstrate the justice and expediency of providing by law for a more suitable and uniform mode of making all such payments hereafter.

Mr. MAY submitted the following resolution; which was read, and laid on the table one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the correspondence which took place in the year 1835, between his Department and James Turney, relative to his appointment to, and acceptance of, the office of register of the land office at Galena, in the State of Illinois; and, also, between the Department and William G. Flood, relative to his appointment to, and acceptance of, the office of register of the land office at Quincy, in the said State of Illinois, in the year 1838; and that the said Secretary be directed to inform this House whether the business of said offices has not been suspended for some time, in consequence of the non-acceptance of the said individuals, and how long it has been so suspended, and why the said offices have not been filled; and whether, notwithstanding the non-acceptance of the said James Turney and William G. Flood, they have been nominated or appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to the said offices. And whether it is known to the Department that these persons are now members of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, and are, at this time, in the discharge of their duties as such.

On motion of Mr. CASEY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the State of Illinois township five north, range fourteen west, in the district of land subject to sale at Palestine, in said

State; said land to be disposed of by the State authority, and the avails thereof to be applied exclusively to the improvement of the navigation of the Embarrass river.

On motion of Mr. SNYDER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of creating ports of entry and delivery at Chicago, Alton, and Cairo, in the State of Illinois.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN, of Alabama, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to investigate the accounts of McNary Harris, as late quartermaster and acting commissary of subsistence to Colonel Benjamin Snodgrass's regiment of Alabama volunteers in Florida, and of making provision for the payment of the same, if found correct.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making three additional land districts in the State of Missouri; that they further inquire into the expediency of providing by law for prospective preemptions.

On motion of Mr. YELL, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of making further provisions for the claimants to military bounty lands; either setting apart a portion of the public land, or to authorize the issuing of scrip to satisfy all such claims.

On motion of Mr. YELL, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of so amending the act of the 7th of July, 1838, establishing the western land district in the State of Arkansas, as to carry into effect the provisions of the said act forthwith.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING, it was

1. Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salaries of the keeper of the public archives in Pensacola and St. Augustine, in Florida.

2. Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sum of money to repair the military road from Jacksonville to Newnansville, in Florida.

Mr. DOWNING moved the following resolutions; which were read, and laid on the table one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, instructed to communicate to this House, at the earliest day practicable, all the information in his Department respecting the disposition which has been made of such negro and other property as has been captured from the hostile Indians in the course of the present war in Florida, and the means (if any) which were adopted to ascertain whether any portion of the property so captured belonged to, or was claimed by, inhabitants of Florida; and whether a fair or reasonable opportunity was afforded to said inhabitants to prefer claims, and show their right of ownership to such captured property; and whether all negroes and other captured property, owned or claimed by citizens of Florida, were surrendered to the owners and claimants; or so bestowed as to secure to said claimants and owners a proper protection of their rights and interests; and whether or not any bargain or arrangement was made by the Government, or its officers, with the Creek Indians, or others employed to aid in the prosecution of the war against the Seminoles, by which said Creeks, or others, have been allowed, either by themselves or agents, to take possession of, and appropriate to their own use and profit, any negroes or other captured property, and if so, to what extent such bargain has been permitted to operate, and what amount of negro and other property has, under its provisions or conditions, been placed at the disposal of said Creeks, or others, and what portion of the property so placed is owned or claimed by citizens of Florida.

2. Resolved, That the Secretary of War be also instructed to ascertain and report to Congress, at the earliest day practicable, the names of all persons (not in the line of the regular Army or of the volunteers or militia) who have been in the course of the present year in Florida, impressed into the service of the United States, or otherwise employed as guides, interpreters, or pack horse men; and what portion, if any, of the persons so employed were slaves, owned or claimed by citizens of Florida; at what rate of compensation they were held in service, and whether such rate of compensation has been paid; and if so, whether it was paid to the owners or claimants of such slaves; and if not paid to them, to whom, and by what authority, was it paid to persons other than such owners or claimants.

And he it resolved, That the Secretary of War be further instructed to furnish at the same time to this House copies of all such correspondence as may have taken place between his Department and the officers from time to time in command of the military forces engaged in the war in Florida; and also all such as may have occurred between his Department and any of the citizens of Florida on the subject of negro or other property lost by them in the war, and especially such as relates to property recaptured from hostile Indians.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following mail routes in Michigan: From Ann Arbor to Springville, by Manchester; from Lafayette to South Haven; from Jefferson to Grand River Road, by Oneida; from Port Gratiot to White Rock; from Romeo to Saginaw Road, by Orion; from Lapeer to Lower Saginaw; from Lapeer to White Rock; from Saginaw to the mouth of the Muskingum; from Port Huron to Tonia.

On motion of Mr. DOTY, it was

Resolved, That the petition of inhabitants of the Wisconsin mining district, praying for a redress of grievances, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury; and that he be requested to direct the attorney of the Territory of Wisconsin to investigate the matters alleged in the petition, and report the facts and evidence to this House at its next session.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN, of Iowa, it was

1. Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for a road from Burlington, on the Mississippi river, through the counties of Des Moines, Henry, and Van Buren, to the Indian agency in the Territory of Iowa. Also, into the expediency of making an appropriation for the survey and examination, with a view to the improvement of the navigation of, Skunk river, in said Territory.

2. Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving the judges of the supreme court of Iowa Territory the same salary as those of Wisconsin; and also into the expediency of so amending the organic law of the said Territory as to require the Governor thereof to return to the Legislative Assembly all bills by them passed, of which he may have refused his approval; and so that, on passing such bills by a majority of two thirds, they shall become laws, subject, however, to be disapproved by Congress.

3. Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to this House the report of the commissioner appointed to survey and mark the boundary line between Missouri and Iowa.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to inform this House why the volunteers from the State of North Carolina were not paid when discharged for the services rendered, for the clothing and equipments furnished by themselves, and the time spent in the service of the United States during the year 1838, while ordered into the Cherokee nation; how long after their discharge, and in what kind of funds, were they paid off; and what portion of said troops are not yet paid, and the reasons which exist for such non-payment.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, containing information called for by the House on the 14th of January instant, connected with the issue of scrip on Virginia military land warrants; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to the order of the House of the 11th of January instant, calling for an account of defalcations by receivers and collectors or other depositaries of public money, since the 1st of October, 1837; and the amount that has been paid, or that remains unpaid, from defaulters, as set forth in the report of the 17th of January, 1838; as, also, the correspondence touching defalcations of receivers and collectors since the Department furnished document No. 297 at the last session of Congress; which report was laid on the table.

The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
January 28, 1839.

SIR: This report is submitted in compliance with the following resolution, adopted by the House of Representatives, on the 11th instant:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House—

"1. What defalcations by receivers and collectors, or other depositaries of the public moneys, have taken place since the 1st of October, 1837; the names of the defaulters, and when and where it took place, and what amount.

"2. What amount has been paid, or what balances appearing due from defaulters in the report of the 17th of January last, have been adjusted and reduced; and that he be required to report to this House all the correspondence touching defalcations of receivers and collectors of the public money since the Department furnished document No. 297."

Under the organization of this Department the duties of the office of Secretary of the Treasury are chiefly of an administrative character. The accounting officers are appointed to determine the liabilities or indebtedness of individuals to the United States, and in settling matters of account, are made, by law, independent of the Secretary. The Comptroller and Solicitor of the Treasury also cause prosecutions to be commenced for defaulters when ascertained; and hence, in answering the first head of inquiry, as was done in answering a similar call made in October, 1837, I have requested the Comptroller to furnish from his books a tabular statement of the information desired under the first head. That statement has been revised by the Solicitor, and contains the names, times, and amounts of the supposed "defalcations by receivers and collectors, or other depositaries of the public money," which have taken place since the 1st of October, 1837. It is annexed.

Fewer of these cases are likely to be mere nominal defaults than in the other document referred to, (No. 111.) as that embraced a period of nearly half a century, and it was not possible for the Comptroller to be acquainted critically with many of the cases. Nor does the present resolution use the same broad language on this subject as that of October, 1837. That called for the names of those collecting and deposit officers "in default to the Government." But this requests a list of all recent "defalcations" among such agents. The first description includes officers whose accounts are unsettled on the books whether from accident, death of the party, informality in vouchers, or actual indebtedness. But the latter term is usually employed in a more restricted sense than the former, and generally includes only such cases as are supposed to consist of real culpable indebtedness of public officers after being legally required to make payment.

It is difficult for the Comptroller to discriminate between these two classes of cases on the books, when they are so numerous and of such long standing; and in order to prevent misapprehension, and a failure to give all the information which was desired, the nominal defaults and amounts, before as well as since October 1, 1837, have, in both statements, been arranged by him in one column, and the supposed amounts of the real indebtedness, unpaid and withheld, so far as known in the accounting offices, have been appended in notes and in another column of remarks. The amounts believed to be secured, or not due in several cases, will also appear in the notes and remarks attached to both of the statements.

The result of the present exhibit is, that since October 1, 1837, no case of defalcation, except that of the late collector at New York, explained already in a special communication, is known to have occurred among the whole number of collectors of duties, amounting to more than one hundred, and that only nine nominal defaults, among near seventy receivers, have happened, and most of those of small amount, and all of them are believed to be well secured.

2. The next inquiry is, "what amount has been paid, or what balances appearing due from defaulters in the report of the 17th January last, 1838, have been adjusted and reduced." Other tabular statements on this subject are annexed, prepared by the Comptroller, and revised by the Solicitor. They show the amounts since paid, and by whom; whether in full or in part; and the further amounts in several cases, supposed to be secured. A previous statement has been prepared in the Comptroller's and Register's offices, and sent to the Senate, in answer to a resolution of that body, which, in each case of collectors duties, exhibits likewise the amount of allowances claimed, which are known to have been offered and suspended. A similar one as to receivers is in the course of preparation.

Besides proper deductions on these accounts, it is believed, from inquiry and observation, that since the year 1789 near twenty per cent. of the balances in the cases of collectors and receivers has, by death and accidents, not been presented and allowed on the books, though, on a full examination, they might be with justice, were all the facts thoroughly known.

In concluding the remarks on this branch of the resolution, it deserves special notice, that by the Comptroller's statement it appears that, notwithstanding the pressure of the times, from a third to half a million, or $426,807, have been collected, secured, or reduced, in little more than a year, from the balances against this class of officers, who were nominally in default previous to October, 1837.

Suspended vouchers exist against the remainder to the amount of near $400,000 in the case of collectors, and to a large amount not yet ascertained in that of receivers. It would seem also, that twenty cases out of about one hundred and seventy in all, have been entirely paid, or more than one ninth of the whole number, and that several have, besides, been much reduced in amount, and many others fully secured.

The Comptroller has not considered the defaults of the banks as coming within this part of the resolution; but the payments made by them since October, 1837, on the balances in default, have been reported to the House of Representatives at the present session, in answer to another resolution, except as respects the old cases of many years' standing, and which remain not very materially altered.

3. The last part of the resolution requests "the correspondence touching defalcations of receivers and collectors of the public money since the Department furnished document No. 297."

This portion of the call is presumed to extend only to the correspondence which is in my own office; otherwise, a difficulty would exist in answering it early, similar to that which occurred in the document No. 111, as it would require a transcript of almost the whole records of the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, during the period specified, and which, though able to be given without much delay in any particular case, might not, in all cases on record, be completed seasonably. The present call may likewise be presumed to extend to the correspondence in my own office, received as well as sent, since the request is for all "correspondence touching defalcations."

But none of the letters received, offering reasons for irregularities and delays in several instances, were given in document No. 297, because that resolution was confined to "letters written by" this Department. Another difference is, that the correspondence now called for and submitted relates to defalcations alone, while the request in document No. 297 was for all the letters written by the Department, as to "omissions to comply with the laws and regulations established for their government and other irregularities," as well as defalcations. It deserves notice that very little, if any, of the correspondence then or now submitted, relates to defalcations after they have been ascertained by the accounting officers, or after they appear on the appropriate books in their charge. In that stage of the case, if letters are written, they are confined chiefly to the Comptroller's and Solicitor's offices, where all defaults are generally investigated and prosecuted. The reasons for any previous correspondence are briefly these: it sometimes happens that, before defaults are legally ascertained on the books of the Comptroller, suspicions are excited in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, by letters received, or other information from third persons, or by delays and irregularities in complying with orders or regulations of the Department. These last happen weekly, if not daily, in such a widespread country, parts of it so new and remote as is much of ours, and with such a vast number of officers connected with the collection, keeping, and disbursing of great amounts of public money. It would, then, seem prudent, or at least it is vigilant and useful, not to wait for the quarterly settlements in the accounting offices to ascertain the fact whether a culpable default has happened or not, but to cause an inquiry into the subject, informally, beforehand. In such cases, therefore, this Department has of late years, if not always, been in the habit of immediately addressing letters of inquiry and of advice concerning informalities, irregularities, and any acts of a doubtful character. By the replies obtained—sometimes quick, though often tardy, being from great distances, and some new regions where the mails are unfrequent, occasionally irregular, and the returns slower than from some foreign countries—it has at times, before the accounts were quarterly settled in the proper offices, succeeded in discovering whether a real defalcation existed or not, and whether the money apparently due could not be obtained without the expense and delay of a suit.

Not seldom, however, such correspondence is from necessity protracted through several months, and then terminates, sometimes in the removal of all suspicion of wrong, sometimes in a satisfactory payment of the money in doubt, sometimes in a correction of all irregularities or informalities, and sometimes in a conviction that there has been a willful default.

Hence this practice has operated usefully. It is courteous, as would seem proper, towards public officers not yet legally shown to be in default, and it is conducive to the public security, by leading, frequently, to more prompt payments. Under a system of greater harshness in ascertaining defaults, by presuming their existence on slighter grounds, and before tested by the quarterly settlements, more removals from office, and more frequent suits, would take place; but they would often prove to be undeserved, would operate at times oppressively, and add nothing to eventual safety. Nor could they in any respect be beneficial compared with that increased severity in the law which has so frequently been recommended, and is so desirable in a moral as well as fiscal view, for punishing defaults after they are clearly ascertained.

During these preliminary inquiries, it is customary for the Department to keep the President advised of their progress, so that if the correspondence terminates unfavorably, the officer found guilty of a deliberate wrong, if not in the mean time resigning, may be promptly removed by the appointing power, without waiting for a defalcation to appear by the quarterly settlements. The President is in a habit of doing this when fully satisfied that the default has been willful, and that the money will not be paid over in conformity to instructions, and without a suit and its accompanying cost and delays. All the correspondence in such cases may be considered as "touching defalcations," and therefore in this report, as well as in document No. 297, has been given in all cases where the supposed defalcations turned out in the end to be real. If in either instance this has been doing more than was necessary, it was considered better to furnish everything that could possibly be embraced within the resolution, than to omit anything pertinent.

But in neither instance has such correspondence with "other depositaries" been given, though very extensive, with the deposit banks in default, because other depositaries are omitted to be specified in this branch of the resolution, which they expressly enumerated in the first branch of it.

Since the document No. 297, no correspondence by this office with any collector, except the late one at New York, and none with any receiver, except in six cases, has taken place where the party appeared, in the end, to have been guilty of a defalcation to any amount whatever. When other cases of defalcations have been detected, they have been, as is customary, ascertained by the accounting officers at the regular settlements, and all communications concerning them have been had with those officers or the Solicitor. In some few instances, when doubt arose, and the correspondence has, from abundant caution, been instituted in this office before the quarterly settlements took place, it has resulted in satisfactory explanations; and no real defalcation is known or believed to have occurred. In one case the investigation has not yet terminated; consequently, copies of neither of these last are supposed to be required under the present resolution.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 29, 1839.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented the petition of Dr. Chapin, Andrew Rothwell, and George Wood, in behalf of the trustees of Columbian College, in the District of Columbia, praying permission to sell a portion of the city lots granted to that institution by Congress, for the purpose of raising money to defray the expense of certain professorships; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of Thomas Brown, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MOUTON presented the petition of James B. Sullivan, of Louisiana, praying confirmation of his title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WHITE presented a communication from the Secretary of War, asking for an appropriation for the removal of the Swan creek and Black river Chippewas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented the remonstrance of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, against the passage of any act to grant titles to land held under floats in the town of Milwaukee; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. L. presented some additional papers in support of the claim of Ashbel Mason; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. L. also presented the petition of George P. Willis and others, who, desiring to emigrate to the Oregon territory, ask for grants of land, and that protection of the Government may be extended to their settlement; which was laid on the table.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Mary Helena America Vespucci, a young lady of Florence, descendant of the celebrated Americus Vespucci, one of the renowned navigators of the fifteenth century, and whose name this continent bears.

Mr. B. said, this petition states the reason which has induced, or rather constrained, this young lady to leave her own country and to seek an asylum in the United States; it also states her reasons for making the requests which the petition contains for the rights of citizenship and a grant of land. He would pass the petition to the table, and ask that it might be read by the Secretary.

The petition was then read by the Secretary.

Mr. B. said that the petition which had just been read, or rather translated by the Secretary, for it was in the French language, was entirely the composition of the petitioner herself. He had seen it in the first draft, and had recommended that nothing, in point of form even, should be altered, and that the petitioner should present her own case in her own language. It was not precisely in the style of petitions drawn up by our own citizens; but what it lacked in parliamentary form it might make up in the more essential qualities of precision and simplicity. The young lady had certainly presented her case delicately and powerfully. She touched with brevity and with feeling the events and circumstances which had thrown her upon this continent, and brought her to solicit the aid of the Congress of the United States. Political reasons had caused her to withdraw from her own country, and in that respect she stood on a footing with others who had heretofore received the friendly aid of this Government. She did not go into a detail of these political reasons—delicacy of feeling, and the brevity of a petition preventing it; but they were known to history, and might be verified by those who should be charged with the inquiry. She was the descendant of one of those renowned navigators—old father mariners, as she felicitously terms them—whose courage, skill, and enterprise illustrated and illuminated the fifteenth century, and, in the course of a few years, changed the face of the world. She was the descendant, and bore the name, of that one of these patriarchal mariners who christened the New World with his own appellation, and caused us to be called Americans. She inherits the blood of that Americus Vespucci whose name has rested for three centuries and a half upon this quarter of the globe, and which will remain upon it forever. She does not call him the discoverer, but the christener and baptiser of the New World. She is now without a country, without protection, without fortune; and she asks for a corner in that land which bears the name of her family, and for the right of citizenship among those who wear the title of Americans.

Mr. B. said it was due to the young lady herself, it would go far towards presenting her in a proper point of view before the Senate, that he should say that, before her arrival in this city, before he had seen her, or heard anything from her, her name was mentioned to him by the French Minister, (Mons. de Pontois,) who stated that she might have some request to make of the Government, and asked if he would take charge of her application. I readily agreed to his request, convinced that a Minister of France could ask nothing of an American Senator which it would be unbecoming in him to do. I agreed to present the petition of the young lady before I saw her. I do not repent of that undertaking. She has now been in this city for some weeks; she has become acquainted with many besides myself; and now, after this appearance among us, and after opportunities for knowledge, and time for forming opinions, I comply with my undertaking, and present her petition—present it, not as a matter of form, and in discharge of an obligation, but with good will and good wishes for her petitioner.

At present, we have nothing to do but to commit the petition. The subject-matter of it does not particularly or exclusively refer itself to any one of our standing committees; but as the main application is for a grant of land, and as similar petitions heretofore from Europeans, exiled for political opinions, have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, I shall move a similar reference in this case, and that the petition be printed in French and English.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, suggested that there was one part of the petition which referred itself to another committee than that on the public lands, and that was the part praying for the rights of citizenship. He would suggest, therefore, that that part of the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON accepted the modification suggested by Mr. C.; and the first part of the petition, asking for a grant of land, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands; while the part asking for the rights of citizenship was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported, without amendment, the bill for the relief of the Louisville Savings Institution. Also, the bill for the relief of Archibald H. Hunter.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Abraham Cunningham; which was agreed to.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the petition of the legal representatives of Elihu Hall Bay, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported—

The bill to confirm certain land claims in the State of Louisiana;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of William Conway; and

The bill for the relief of Pierre Barbour; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, reported a bill in addition to an act to promote the useful arts; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the memorial of — Towns and others, citizens of New York, for the abolition of the duty on foreign coal, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Thomas Glascock, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of — Rogers, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ROANE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of the late Lewis Grant Davidson; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HUBBARD submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for certain papers in relation to the claim of Charles J. Catlett; which was considered and agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented a resolution, directing an inquiry into the propriety of compensating William Wall for a horse lost in the public service; which was adopted.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to send to the Senate a copy of the report of the commissioners appointed to run the southern boundary line of the Territory of Iowa.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing patents to issue in the name of the assignee or assignees of such persons whose names shall appear upon the list of reserves, returned by the United States agent for the Choctaws, as entitled to reservations under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians: Provided, The assignment shall be, in all respects, regular; and satisfactory proof shall be made of the fairness of the contract to purchase, and the payment of the purchase money.

REPEAL OF SALT DUTY.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the leave asked by him to introduce a bill to repeal the duty on salt, and the fishing bounties and allowances dependant thereon.

A debate then ensued, in which Messrs. WILLIAMS of Maine, BENTON, DAVIS, BUCHANAN, NILES, and RUGGLES, took part.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was negatived—yeas 12, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Nicholas, Norvell, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, and Williams of Maine—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Wall, White, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—24.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 29, 1839.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, of Massachusetts, and by unanimous consent, the bill for the relief of Winslow Lewis was read a third time and passed.

MAIL STATISTICS.

Mr. BRIGGS, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to communicate to this House, on the earliest convenient day of the next session, the distance of mail routes established by law in the whole United States, and the distance in each State and Territory, the number of miles the mails may have been transported in the United States and in each of said States and Territories during the current year, the average cost per mile, and the aggregate cost in the same; and the amount received for postages in each State and Territory, and the whole amount paid to postmasters for their services during the same period. That he also be directed to report the whole number of letters carried in the mail during the said period, charged with postage, designating the number under each denomination of postage, and the amount of postage on each class, the amount charged on newspapers, pamphlets, and periodicals, and the number of free letters carried during the same period. That said Postmaster General be further directed to state what, in his opinion, would be the effect upon the revenues of the Department, by establishing the following tariff of postages on letters, viz: On letters carried eighty miles and under, five cents; over eighty and not exceeding two hundred miles, ten cents; over two hundred and not exceeding four hundred miles, fifteen cents; over four hundred miles, twenty cents; and to state what other tariff, fixing the rates in Federal money, and having in view the greatest reduction consistent with the necessary means of the Department, if any, in his opinion would be more just than the above. And that he also state what alterations, if any, may be made in the present rates of postages on newspapers, pamphlets, and periodicals, so as to promote the circulation of information, without detriment to the revenue of the Department. That he report a plan for putting up and regulating boxes in post offices in large towns; and that he also be directed to submit a plan for regulating the transmission of letters between this and foreign countries.

REPORTS FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1839.

Also, with an amendment, Senate bill supplementary to the act establishing the Mint of the United States.

Also, a bill to repeal the proviso of the second section of an act approved the 3d of March, 1837, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise the claim of the United States against certain banks. [It relates to the Alleghany Bank of Pennsylvania.]

The bill, on Mr. C.'s motion, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

CHEROKEE QUESTION.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that, in the report he submitted a few days ago on the state of the finances, there was contained a document furnished by the Indian department, containing a statement which was correct; but there was a note appended to it which was incorrect, and did injustice to two members of the House, [Messrs. EVERETT and BELL,] and he was instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move that that part of the report be corrected, by striking therefrom the passage referred to.

Mr. MERCER moved to lay the motion on the table, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. EVERETT explained his course on the Cherokee question, to show that the note referred to had done him two-fold injustice, though he was not very solicitous about it.

Mr. BIDDLE moved to commit the motion, so that the report might be amended in other particulars, especially in reference to that part of it which reviewed the pension system, and went on to reply to the argument of the report on this and other subjects.

Mr. CAMBRELENG made a brief explanation in reply.

Mr. PICKENS expressed his gratification that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had come out thus early in opposition to the principles of this report—a document to which Mr. P. gave his most cordial and hearty support. He rejoiced that the Committee of Ways and Means had thrown out such a document, and would to God that an issue could be made upon it before the people of this country; and he took that occasion to say, that let any party act upon the principles of this report, and they may always rely upon his open and unqualified support; no matter where they came from, whether from the North, the South, or the middle section of this country. It is a report congenial to the spirit and genius of our institutions, and purely republican in all its sentiments and propositions; and he desired to see the test vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and hoped that vote would be understood as a vote which was to range parties upon the questions touched upon in that report.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had condemned the reference to the tariff in the report. In this, Mr. P. thought the committee had acted wisely; for was there a gentleman upon that floor, was there a tyro in politics, who did not know that, at this very moment, parties were organizing in this country with a view to meet the crisis which would come on in 1842, when the compromise act would expire? They all knew it, and the committee acted honestly and judiciously in meeting the question in advance. Why, the measures of this very Congress, remote as they would seem to be, will have an important bearing on it. Exhaust your Treasury, vote away all the public money upon profligate schemes of appropriation, and you will be compelled either to issue Treasury notes or to borrow money. And what must inevitably follow? You must increase your taxes on imports; you must raise the tariff. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has attacked the principles of the report upon these points; he has indicated his course; he has even quoted the title to the first act passed under the Federal Constitution, to prove that protection to manufactures was coeval with our Government, &c.; but yet, forsooth, the gentleman protests against his committing himself upon this point. He may quote the titles to all your first acts, to prove the constitutionality of your tariffs, but such quotations would fail to convince him, (Mr. P.) They would fail to show that they were congenial with the first principles of the Constitution. Yet he would not discuss these points at present; he would only say that he should rejoice to shiver a lance with the gentleman, on these subjects, at the proper time; and he was proud to say that he should have to meet in this conflict the shield of even a Knight Templar.

The principles of this report (added Mr. P.) are the principles of reform and retrenchment, which seem to be the popular doctrines of the day. Now he wanted to see who are the gentlemen prepared to do their lip service to the goddess of reform, and to bow down and worship, in their hearts, profligacy and recklessness of expenditure. Vote appropriations, as you have done heretofore, with an utter disregard to the condition of the Treasury, and you will be compelled to issue Treasury notes or borrow money. He repeated, in conclusion, that he desired to see parties ranged under the principles of that report. It was a noble document, and the party which took its stand upon it would risk much at first, but would triumph in the end. We were now about to take a new latitude and departure, and he desired to see the other side come out. Mr. P. rejoiced that the gentleman had made his motion, and again expressed a hope that it would be considered as a test question.

The orders of the day were then proceeded to.

SEMINOLE INDIANS.

Mr. EVERETT, on leave, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the location and temporary support of the Seminole Indians removed from Florida.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANGS in the chair,) on the appropriation bills; and, on motion of the former gentleman, they were taken up in the following order:

The bill making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners for the year 1839, was considered and ordered to be reported without amendment.

The bill making appropriations for the protection of the northern frontier of the United States was amended; and, after a brief discussion between Messrs. CAMBRELENG, BELL, GARLAND of Louisiana, and BRONSON, was ordered to be reported to the House.

The bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year 1839, was amended in a few particulars, and laid aside.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the naval service for the year 1839, was amended, and laid aside.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year 1839, was taken up; and after some amendments, moved by Mr. CAMBRELENG, had been agreed to.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out the following clause:

"For taxes on the Passyunk arsenal, near Philadelphia, for the year 1839, $785 50."

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the United States had never yet acquired jurisdiction over this property from the State.

Mr. CRARY. Then that offers an additional reason for the motion, and an irresistible one why an arsenal should be removed altogether, over which they could not claim jurisdiction.

Mr. MALLORY hoped the motion would prevail, for this charge was the only instance of the kind in the whole country.

The motion prevailed.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, complained of the reduction made in this bill of the item of $300,000 for the national armories, from $360,000, which had been appropriated in former years.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, moved to add the sum of $60,000 to the item, and advocated his amendment.

The amendment was briefly opposed by Messrs. CAMBRELENG and PETRIKIN.

Mr. PRATT was understood to be in favor of the amendment, and in the course of his remarks deprecated the principles urged by some, that the Government should manufacture for itself, instead of having her arms procured by means of private contracts. He contended that the Government had cares enough to occupy its various departments, without increasing them by becoming a great manufacturer, and showed that, so far as the economy of the matter was concerned, it results greatly to its advantage to have all its arms made by contract. There would not be that strict regard to economy in labor, in establishments owned by the Government, as all experience conclusively showed, as is used by private individuals; hence their ability to manufacture for the Government at a less rate than it could possibly be done by any other system it might invent or put in operation.

He was in favor of exciting a just competition among the mechanics. Let competition come in for its share. By creating this competition we excite among the mechanics a kind of emulation, which brings into requisition all their ingenuity, and causes developments and improvements in mechanism, which otherwise might be dormant and be lost to the world. He was opposed to this principle of Government manufactures for other, and, he conceived, as weighty reasons. He said, in warm party excitement the conflict would be even carried into the Government work-shops. The party which might succeed would, in all probability, be induced to make political preferences, and would employ only those who might suit its political views; and thus, in the rise and fall of every Administration, we would witness a discharge and a new selection. He always wished to see the mechanics of our country occupy the high and independent ground they now stand upon, uninfluenced by the contaminating rule of party. He never wished to see man's labor so connected with the Government as to bias or control, in the remotest degree, his political principles or party preferences. The offices under the Constitution belong to the public, and are not created or conferred upon individuals for their peculiar benefit, but for the good and welfare of the community. But as a man's labor is his own private property, and belongs exclusively to himself, and which he alone has the right to guard and protect, therefore would he deprecate any state of things which would tend to violate this sacred right. It was for these reasons that he was opposed to what are called Government mechanics. Mr. P. said he was proud to be a mechanic himself, and wished to protect the interests of that worthy class of men, so far as his ability could have any influence. Believing, as he did, that it was a saving to the Government to continue to purchase or contract for such arms as were necessary, he would vote for the amendment, to continue the usual appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, obtained the floor, and opposed the amendment; it was further supported by Messrs. LINCOLN, MERCER, and CALHOUN of Massachusetts; when, on dividing the committee, there were—ayes 55, noes 42; no quorum. Tellers were ordered, and the vote was announced—ayes 52, noes 54; still no quorum.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, the committee rose, and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved a call of the House; and, on dividing the House by tellers, there were—ayes 39, noes 78; still no quorum.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 30, 1839.

A message was received from the President of the United States, inclosing a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of balances reported on the books of the Treasury against disbursing agents of the Government, to which the President invites the attention of Congress; and,

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the documents were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of War, in reply to the resolution of the Senate of the 22d instant, in relation to cannon and howitzers, inclosing a report from the colonel of ordnance on the subject.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, it was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of a number of citizens of Illinois, asking for a grant of lands in Oregon Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of Samuel Raub, jr., relative to steam-boilers and safety-valves, and at the same time presented some additional documents showing new and valuable improvements made by Mr. Raub in the steam engine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of the heirs of Pierre Marden, asking confirmation of title to eight hundred arpens of land in Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of General Jacob Vroom, collector of the customs for the district of Genesee, New York, praying for the passage of a law to authorize the settlement of his accounts on the principles of equity; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of the Dubroca tract, in the State of Alabama, on the subject of the titles to their lands; which was laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG presented three petitions from citizens of Green county, Illinois, praying for the establishment of certain mail routes; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ROANE presented a memorial of the corporation of the city of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WRIGHT, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill more effectually to secure public moneys in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LINN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to allow a drawback of duties on merchandise imported via Missouri to the provinces of Mexico; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of the Springfield Manufacturing Company, reported the same with an amendment; which was read.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Richard Cogan.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HUBBARD gave notice that he would tomorrow ask leave to introduce a bill making a grant of land in aid of certain internal improvements in Wisconsin.

Mr. BENTON moved that three papers received from the Adjutant General's office, showing the number of lives lost in the campaigns in Florida, be printed; which motion was agreed to.

The bill from the House for the relief of Winslow Lewis was read twice and referred.

After a short time spent in executive business,

The resolution submitted some days ago by Mr. BENTON, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement showing what would be the deficiency in the Treasury, had the bill for distributing the proceeds of the public lands, which was vetoed by President Jackson, become a law, was taken up; when

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. BENTON called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which, being ordered, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, and White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—23.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 37, nays 1; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—37.

NAY—Mr. Smith, of Indiana—1.

The remaining resolutions on the table were then adopted.

The resolution submitted by Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, on the subject of the improvement of the harbor of Michigan City, was taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. KING, SEVIER, YOUNG, and NORVELL, was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the amendments of the House to the bill to renew the patent of Thomas Blanchard, were taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. DAVIS, BENTON, SEVIER, NILES, and STRANGE, were laid on the table.

REPEAL OF SALT DUTY.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the question on granting leave to him to introduce a bill to repeal the duty on salt, was taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. RUGGLES, SOUTHARD, BENTON, WILLIAMS of Maine, and CALHOUN.

Mr. NORVELL said, that in voting, as he should, for granting leave to bring in this bill, he did not desire to be considered as committing himself as to his vote upon the bill itself. His present impression was that he should go for an entire repeal of the duty upon salt, but against the abolition of the bounty to the fisheries.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lima, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, White, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Morrill, Nicholas, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and Williams of Maine—19.

Leave having been thus given, the bill was then read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. KING, the bill for the benefit of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company was taken up for consideration, and, after some explanatory remarks from Messrs. KING and LUMPKIN, in explanation, it was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill for the extension of time for paying duties on railroad iron imported by the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company was taken up for consideration, and, after an amendment extending the same privileges to the State of Illinois, it was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK, the joint resolution directing the manner in which certain laws of the District are to be executed, was taken up.

Mr. SEVIER was in favor of the object of the resolution, which provided for granting a pre-emption right to a squatter on the public lands; but thought that the case was embraced by the pre-emption law of last session, and that the Commissioner of the General Land Office was authorized to grant the desired relief.

A long and amusing debate ensued, in which Messrs. MERRICK, ROANE, BUCHANAN, CLAY of Alabama, BENTON, and SEVIER participated; and the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 30, 1839.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Hon. EDWARD B. HUBLEY, communicating the resignation of his seat as a member of the present Congress; which was laid on the table.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the House went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. ADAMS in the chair) on the President's annual message; the question immediately under consideration being on the following resolution, the twelfth of the series moved by Mr. HAYNES for the distribution of that document among appropriate committees:

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the questions arising out of the mandamus issued by the circuit court of the District of Columbia, at the relation of Stockton and Stokes, against the Postmaster General, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRARY concluded his remarks in reply to Mr. BELL principally, and the Opposition generally, and which will be given hereafter.

Mr. CLARK spoke for an hour and a half in explication of the course of the Conservatives. He contended that the Whigs and Conservatives thought alike, and it was their duty to act alike. He denounced the doctrines embodied in the message of the President, at the extra session, as heterodox and damnable; and that he would not have voted for the Speaker, had that document been read previous to the election. He denied that the Administration had ever been in the majority in the House upon any great public measure; that they were now in the minority, and trusted in God that they ever would continue to be so long as they attempted to carry out certain measures.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, disclaimed, so far as he and the Conservatives of the South were concerned, that the Whigs and Conservatives had formed an alliance; and never could form an alliance with the Whig party. He claimed to stand isolated from both the great political parties. The opinions of the leaders of the Whig party were antipodes to those he held; and should they get into power, the bank, the tariff, and internal improvement by the General Government, would be their leading policy, which he, for one, could never advocate. He disclaimed the views of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK,] not for himself alone, but for all the Conservatives of the South. If the Whigs should get into power, and carry out the principles they entertain, whether here or in Virginia, he would be in the opposition.

Mr. THOMPSON obtained the floor, and on his motion the committee rose.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. EVERETT, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, called up the bill appropriating $10,000 towards the expenses of providing a location for the Seminole Indians when removed; which was agreed to without amendment, and laid aside to be reported.

Mr. BRONSON endeavored to have the bill amended which provides for the defense of the northern frontier; but his amendment was pronounced out of order.

The committee, after some desultory conversation about a clerk for the superintendent of the Western Territory, rose and reported the following bills; which were severally ordered to be engrossed:

A bill making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1839.

A bill making an appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier of the United States;

A bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenditures of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year 1839;

A bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1839;

A bill to provide for the location and temporary support of the Seminole Indians removed from Florida.

FALMOUTH AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD.

Mr. MERCER asked the assent of the House to take up the bill, which had been ordered to be engrossed, entitled "A bill giving the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, entitled 'An act incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad.'"

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to taking the bill up out of its order; whereupon,

Mr. MERCER moved to suspend the rules for that purpose; which motion the House agreed to.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

VIRGINIA MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was then taken up and passed, viz: "A bill to repeal the second section of an act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office."

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a communication received from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of the balances reported on the books of the Treasury, against collecting and disbursing officers of the Government, to which I beg leave to invite the early attention of Congress.

M. VAN BUREN.

January 28, 1839.

Also, a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting documents in relation to the marking of the southern boundary line of the Territory of Iowa, from Albert M. Lea, Esq., the commissioner appointed to attend to the duty.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, it was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, the Quartermaster General, and Commissary General of Subsistence, inclosing the correspondence between these departments and General J. W. A. Sanford, in relation to the supplies purchased by the officers of Government for the Creek Indians.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 31, 1839.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, presented a petition, numerously signed by the citizens of Evansville, Indiana, praying Congress to establish a hospital at that place.

The petition shows the fitness of Evansville as a point for a hospital for the benefit of the commerce of the States of Illinois and Indiana in a striking manner. It states that over twenty thousand persons annually land at that point from the Ohio river, who reside in these States; that at least two thousand flat boats go out of the Wabash and White rivers, laden with produce for the lower markets, each year; that the number is rapidly increasing; that two thirds of the hands from these boats land, on their return, at that place, many of them bringing diseases from New Orleans and other places, which render them unable to proceed to their homes.

Mr. S. said, on his motion, Evansville had been inserted in the resolution of inquiry on this subject, as he was well satisfied of the necessity of a hospital at that point. He asked that the petition might be referred to the committee to which that resolution had been directed. The petition was so referred.

Mr. S. also presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Indiana, praying aid in the construction of the New Albany and Mount Carmel railroad, which, on his motion, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEVIER offered a joint resolution from the Legislature of Arkansas, on the subject of establishing the boundary line between Texas and this Government; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A joint resolution from the same, asking for an appropriation to complete the improvement of the Arkansas river; and a joint resolution from the same, asking for an appropriation to complete the road from the Mississippi river, opposite Memphis, to Little Rock; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented the petition of Dr. E. A. Theller, who stated that he was a native of Ireland, and had been naturalized, and resides in this country; that he had joined in the expedition for the invasion of Canada, and had been taken prisoner; that he had been tried, and convicted of treason—the judge charging the jury on his trial that his act of naturalization in this country was null and of non-effect, and that no subsequent act could expatriate him from his original allegiance. Under these circumstances, Dr. T. asks that Congress should take some action on the subject, which would define the rights of naturalized citizens.

After some remarks from Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky,

Mr. NORVELL said that the memorialist was a citizen of Michigan. He was an intelligent man, but an enthusiast in whatever related to human liberty. He had sent to him the counterpart of the memorial just presented. The facts in the memorial were as stated by the Senator from Kentucky. The memorialist was a native of Ireland, but a naturalized citizen of the United States. In the early part of the past year, he embarked in the struggle for Canadian liberty. He was captured in the Upper Province of Canada, and taken to Toronto. There he was tried, condemned, and sentenced to execution on a charge of high treason against the Queen of Great Britain. The chief justice of the Province, who presided at the trial, instructed the jury that no subject of the kingdom could ever expatriate himself. Birth, and the residence of one hour in the British dominions, created a perpetual allegiance. From this allegiance the subject could never be exonerated, under any plea or pretense. The memorialist owed his present safety from the penalties of treason, to his escape from the citadel of Quebec.

These were the facts which gave rise to this memorial. Upon these facts, the memorialist appeals to Congress to adopt measures for the adjustment of this question of perpetual allegiance claimed by Great Britain from all her native-born subjects, and for the protection of all such subjects as have become, or may become, naturalized citizens of the United States. The subject was certainly one of great importance. The doctrine of perpetual allegiance, asserted by Great Britain, was an absurd relic of feudal barbarism. It was incompatible with the Constitution and laws of naturalization of the United States. By those, British subjects may and do become American citizens. They are entitled, equally with our native citizens, to protection in all their lawful pursuits, wherever they may happen to be. This Government was bound thus to protect them, in peace and in war. Mr. Madison, in the last war with Great Britain, steadily maintained this principle, resisted the claim of that kingdom to the perpetual allegiance of her subjects after they had become our citizens, and repeatedly intimated his determination to retaliate for every injury inflicted upon our naturalized citizens, captured as prisoners of war, if they were punished on the ground of their being subjects, or if they were treated differently from other prisoners of war. The memorialist was mistaken in supposing that the treaty of peace between this country and Great Britain recognized the right of that kingdom to the perpetual allegiance of her native-born subjects. No such expression is to be found in those treaties. Our revolutionary ancestors were all British subjects at one time. In separating from the mother country, they ceased to be her subjects. And how could they, in the treaty of peace which recognized them as a separate and independent nation, permit Great Britain to assert any claim to the perpetual allegiance of those who were born within the British realms?

No principle is more clear than that the naturalized citizens of the United States possess all the right, and are entitled to all the protection, which could be claimed by native citizens. No duty is more imperative upon the Government than that of affording equal protection to the naturalized as to the native citizen; and he had no recollection of any failure on the part of any Republic or any Administration to perform its duty in this respect.

The circumstances which had produced this memorial were peculiar, and had embarrassed any action which the Government might have been disposed to take on the subject. The memorialist had, in his zeal for the liberty of a foreign province not prepared to assert its own freedom, invaded that foreign province; had, with a number of our native citizens, waged war upon the British authorities, while his own country was at peace and amity with them, and had been captured. He and his coadjutors had voluntarily, at least for a time, expatriated themselves. They had left their own country to engage in a foreign civil war. Now, in this situation, what right had our Government to exercise its power for their protection, except by way of friendly interposition? If the memorialist had been taken while fighting the battles of his adopted country; if, without committing aggression upon the established Government of a foreign Power, he had, while passing through any part of its dominions, been taken on any pretext, and tried for any offense not committed against the peace of that Power, and condemned on the claim of a perpetual allegiance from him, then this Government would have been bound to interpose for his protection, and would have protected him. As it was, the Executive acted with regard to him precisely as it did with regard to native citizens captured at the same time with him. It sent an agent to Toronto for the purpose of prevailing with the provincial authorities to release the prisoners; it made no distinction between the naturalized and the native citizen. What more could it do, without involving the nation in a war? It might have made a formal declaration that it would never recognize the principle of perpetual allegiance, as asserted in the trial and condemnation of the memorialist. It might, as intimated by the Senator from Kentucky, have remonstrated against that barbarous principle; but if it had done so, the danger was, that he would have been forthwith ordered to execution, for the very purpose of showing a determination practically to maintain the British claim to the perpetual allegiance of their subjects. He had no doubt that this consideration had operated upon the Executive in this case. He had alluded to these facts to show that this Government had not been inattentive to its duty on this occasion.

He concurred with the memorialist in the praise awarded to the emigrants from Europe to this country. They were among our most useful and patriotic citizens. They were to be found side by side with our native citizens, "in every field of honorable enterprise." They were industrious, zealous, energetic, in whatever direction they turned their attention. In council, at the polls, wherever their adopted country's good demanded their devotion, their patriotism was equalled only by their manly boldness. In the battle field, their fearless daring and courage were proverbial. In the humble hut, in the more elevated dwelling, in their domestic relations, they were equally kind-hearted and hospitable. They were entitled, equally with the native citizen, to the protection of our laws. The national faith had been sacredly pledged and observed towards them; and he, for one, would never falter in his determination to see that faith, hereafter, fully redeemed in regard to all the pledges which their migration hither, and their adoption as citizens, required us to redeem. Less than this they could not expect; more than this they do not ask.

He hoped that the subject would be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That very able committee would bestow upon it every attention which its importance demanded; and if they could present a law or declaration by which our naturalized citizens could be more effectually secured in all their constitutional and legal rights, and foreign Powers admonished that they would be required to treat our citizens of that description in precisely the same way in which native Americans were treated by them, no man would more sincerely rejoice than he would. He trusted that some effective measure could be suggested. All the evils of war ought to be encountered to maintain the rights of our naturalized citizens, as conferred upon them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STRANGE presented a memorial from citizens of Wilmington, North Carolina, praying for the erection of a light-house on Cape Clear; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of William B. Adams; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of William Stacker; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of the Friendship Fire Company of Alexandria, praying an appropriation of money to enable them to purchase new apparatus; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented some documents in relation to the bill in favor of settlers who have been deprived of the benefits of the preemption law of June, 1834; which were laid on the table.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate the total amount of revenue, from all sources, which accrued and was received into the public Treasury, and the aggregate amount of the expenditures of the General Government, in all branches of the public service, during each year, from January 1, 1817, to January 1, 1839, distinguishing the payments made each year on account of the national debt; and that this information be reported in connection with that required by the resolution of the Senate on the 29th January, 1839, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate whether any, and, if any, how much, would have been the deficit in the Treasury if an act entitled "An act to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting lands to certain States," which passed both Houses of Congress, had received the approbation of the President, and been acted upon up to January 1, 1839.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, to which the bill for the abolition of the duty on salt, and of the bounty to fishing vessels was referred, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the duty upon all breadstuffs, beef and pork, iron, sugar, molasses, and lead.

BILLS PASSED.

The joint resolution directing the manner in which certain laws of the District shall be executed, was taken up on its third reading, and passed.

The following bills were taken up on their third reading, and passed:

An act for the relief of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company; and

An act to authorize the extension of time for payment of duties on railroad iron imported by the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company—ayes 24, noes 10.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Charles S. Walsh, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, without amendment, the bill for the relief of Richard Banks.

Mr. LINN observed that the Committee on Private Land Claims had been assiduously engaged, for the last three years, in the discharge of their duties, and had reported a number of bills, which had passed the Senate, though but very few of them had been sanctioned by the other House, the others having failed for want of time. Now, this was very burdensome on the committee, and he hoped that this year they would be more fortunate. To avoid the difficulties which had hitherto stood in the way of these bills, he would move that, for the remainder of the session, the Saturdays of each week be set apart for their consideration.

This motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution in favor of the heirs of Robert Walker, and the petition of the heirs of William Merritt.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections, made a special report thereon.

The report having been read,

Mr. CRITTENDEN observed that this bill had been in the hands of the committee about a month and a half, of which he did not complain, as they had a right to give the subject the most ample consideration. He only desired that an early period might be allowed him for a discussion of this subject. He desired to bring to the notice of the Senate the sophistries by which this greatest vice in our system was defended. He thought that the respect due to a member of the body might have allowed the gentleman some more temperance of language in expressing his disapprobation of the bill. He now moved that the bill be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, this day week.

Mr. HUBBARD had no objection to the motion. He called for the reading of the report, because he confessed that he was somewhat surprised at the reading of the bill of the Senator from Kentucky. All he now rose for was to move that the report be printed, and also for the printing of an extra number of copies; and to test the sense of the Senate, he would move for the printing of ten thousand extra copies.

The report was here ordered to be printed; and the question arising on the motion to print the extra copies,

Mr. NORVELL suggested the propriety of ordering twenty thousand copies of this report to be printed. Notwithstanding the character ascribed to it by the Senator from Kentucky, he considered the report an unanswerable response to a bill which proposed to strike down the vital and fundamental rights of a large portion of the legal voters of the United States. He desired all his constituents to see this report. He should, therefore, prefer the printing of twenty thousand to the smaller number proposed.

The question was then taken, and ten thousand extra copies of the bill and report were ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of John Kern and John D. George, and the bill for the relief of Gilbert A. Smith, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do not pass.

Mr. C., from the same committee, reported the bill for the relief of John A. Beall, with amendments; the bill for the relief of Frederick Pray, with an amendment; and the bill for the relief of Andrew C. Mettler.

Mr. C., from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce, to provide for the instruction of boys for the naval service, and from the petition of John Rainey; which was agreed to.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of John Randolph Clay, reported the same without amendment.

The Senate then went into the consideration of executive business; after which it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 31, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read,

Mr. HAYNES asked leave to move that the House go into committee again on the President's message.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the gentleman would suffer the bills reported yesterday to be read a third time.

Mr. HAYNES waived his motion for the present.

Mr. EVERETT, on leave, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, a joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a statement of the awards made by the commissioners under the Choctaw treaty; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. NAYLOR asked the consent of the House to take up for consideration the resolutions submitted by him on Monday last, calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for copies of the charges alleged against Commodore Elliott for certain conduct, preferred by Midshipman Barton.

Mr. HAYNES said he must object to any interruption of the business properly before the House.

Mr. NAYLOR sincerely hoped the gentleman would withdraw his objection, for it was an act of justice to Commodore Elliott himself that this information should be communicated to the country.

Mr. HAYNES said the public business of the country was certainly second to no private inquiry, and, therefore, he must persist in his objection.

Mr. NAYLOR thereupon asked a suspension of the rules.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LINCOLN, on leave, presented a communication from the Postmaster General to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, setting forth the danger to which the books and papers of the Post Office Department are exposed, by reason of the combustible nature of the buildings now occupied by the said Department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIES asked the House to take up the resolution submitted by him on Monday, proposing to change the daily hour of meeting of the House to ten o'clock, a.m.

Objection being made,

Mr. DAVIES moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays.

The House refused both requests.

Mr. KENNEDY asked leave to call up the resolution submitted by him some days since, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a return of such marine stores, supplied to the different navy-yards, as were not included in the regular contracts.

Objection being made,

Mr. K. moved a suspension of the rules, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on his call for them, were taken, and announced as follows: yeas 57, nays 74.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CHAMBERS renewed the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of calling up Mr. NAYLOR's resolution, relating to the affair between Commodore Elliott and Midshipman Barton, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on his call, they were taken, and were—yeas 91, nays 66.

Not being two thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. GRAVES asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House whether Charles J. Ingersoll, late district attorney of Philadelphia, has paid all or any portion of $76,491, for which he was reported a defaulter by the said Secretary on the 17th January, 1838; and also to furnish this House with all the accounts and demands of said Ingersoll against the Government during the continuance, or since the expiration, of the time he was in office.

Objection being made,

Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on his motion, they were taken, and were—yeas 97, nays 73.

So the rules were not suspended, not being two thirds.

Mr. MERCER made an ineffectual attempt to induce the House to suspend the rules to enable him to offer a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for a return of the sums expended by the General Government in works of internal improvement.

Mr. RARIDEN presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals as the appropriate committee.

Mr. R. then asked leave to move the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on Monday last, calling upon the Secretary of War for a return of all disbursements by Indian agents, officers of the Army, &c.

Objection being made, Mr. R. moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 73, nays 80.

So the rules were not suspended.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 20th instant, giving a statement of the dates and amounts of official bonds of the collectors and naval officers at the ports of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, with the names of the securities of the said collectors, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with an act of Congress, inclosing a statement of the contracts authorized by that Department during the year 1838; and a statement of contracts relating to light-houses, floating lights, beacons, buoys, stockages, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read the third time and passed:

A bill making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1839;

A bill to provide for the location and temporary support of the Seminole Indians removed from Florida;

A bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year 1839; and

A bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1839.

The bill to provide for the protection of the northern frontier, was, at the suggestion of Mr. McKAY, postponed until to-morrow.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House go into committee on the remaining appropriation bills; but, on dividing the House, the vote was—aye 57, noes 45; no quorum.

Mr. C. called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 91, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allan, Banks, Beirne, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, Cambreling, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Cushman, Darlington, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Farrington, Richard Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Grantland, Grant, Halstead, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Henry, Holsey, Holt, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kemple, Kingensmith, Legare, Lewis, Lincoln, Loomis, Sampson Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Mercer, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noyes, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Paynter, Pearce, Peck, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Richardson, Ridgway, Rives, Robertson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Sibley, Snyder, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Webster, Whitteley, Lewis Williams, Worthington, and Yell—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Ayer, Bell, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Davies, Ewing, Goode, William Graham, Graves, Harper, Hawes, Herod, Lyon, Mallory, Maury, Maxwell, Menefee, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Poits, Putnam, Rariden, Shields, Slade, Stanly, Stone, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Sherrard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Word—45.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, resumed the consideration of the annual Army bill.

The question pending was the amendment of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, to increase the proposed appropriation for the national armories from $300,000 to $360,000, (the amount in former years.)

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, supported the amendment, and said he should consider the proposed reduction as a virtual abandonment of the system. He went on to show the large amounts of arms which had been manufactured in England and France within a short period of time; referred to the embarrassed condition of the United States during the war for the want of a proper supply of arms; and contended that it was not much better off at the present time; that there was much difficulty in the State which he in part represented to supply its volunteer companies, and had no doubt such was the case in other States. He thought if a reduction in the expenditures was necessary, it should begin with those who were the best able to bear it—the superintendents, paymasters, and other officers of the Government, and not by cutting off the means which keep in employment the poor mechanics. He appealed to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to consent to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON.]

Mr. MURRAY warned the friends of the Administration against the renewal of the cry of extravagance which the Opposition have charged against it. Let them beware that they do not furnish the Opposition with weapons to carry on their war to overthrow it. He was not opposed to judicious appropriations; and trusted that his party would not be; but thought that the amount proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means was amply sufficient to carry on this branch of the public service, if due regard be had to economy. Mr. M. then went into a review of the more prominent measures of General Jackson's administration, and dwelt at some length on the Indian policy, replying to the remarks of Mr. EVERETT, some days ago, on the mode of executing the Cherokee treaty, and giving a history of the Seminole question, exonerating the Administration from all censure in that matter, but demonstrating that the whole had grown out of the perfidy and sanguinary spirit of those Indians. Nor were our reverses in Florida to be laid to the charge of the Administration, for the most skillful generals, and troops equal to any living, were sent there; but they had an unhealthy and deadly climate to contend with, boundless and trackless forests and swamps to wade through; were often without food and clothing; and yet, after enduring all these hardships and privations, they had met with little in return but abuse, while the Indian and his struggles had been lauded to the skies, and all were brought forward as so many arguments against the Administration. Mr. M. then went into an examination of the pension system, the expenditures of the Government, &c., and dwelt on these and various other topics at considerable length; a full report of which will be given hereafter.

On motion of Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, the committee rose and reported progress.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and
House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject of commissions claimed by agents or officers employed by the General Government. The propriety of new legislation, regulating the whole matter by express laws, seems very apparent, and is urgently recommended to the early attention of Congress.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1839.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, inclosing estimates of the appropriations for the naval service for the year 1839; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 1, 1839.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Treasury Department, prepared in obedience to the acts for establishing the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, on the subject of the contracts authorized by the Treasury Department, with the expenditures under them, during the year 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also communicated a similar report from the Navy Department; which was disposed of in like manner.

The VICE PRESIDENT also presented a communication from the Treasury Department, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 30th instant, showing what would have been the deficiency in the Treasury, if the bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, which was vetoed by President Jackson, had become a law; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of commissions claimed by officers and agents of the Government, and recommending the propriety of additional legislation, to regulate the whole matter by express laws; which was laid on the table.

PETITION, ETC.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of the officers of the United States revenue cutter Rush, praying that officers of the revenue service may be placed on the same footing as to pensions as the officers of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of St. Louis, asking for an appropriation for the support of their harbor; which was laid on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the bill for the relief of Daniel Marsack, without amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the petition of Ezra Thurber had been referred, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame du Lusser; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. FULFON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported two bills, without amendment, that had been referred to that committee.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the subject of surveying the public lands in Illinois, moved that the committee be discharged therefrom, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. C., from the same committee, to which had been referred the bills from the House for the relief of Jonathan Boone and Robert Murray, reported the same without amendment.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the Committee on Private Land Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joseph J. Bowie.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Miguel Eslava.

The resolution reported from the joint Library Committee, relative to the printing of the Madison papers, was considered and adopted.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. CRITTENDEN were taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. BENTON, CRITTENDEN, KNIGHT, and SMITH of Indiana, were amended and adopted.

Mr. CALHOUN offered the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate whether the Government of Great Britain has made compensation in the cases of the brigs Enterprise, Eucomium, and Comet, the first of which was forced by stress of weather into Port Hamilton, Bermuda Islands, and the other two wrecked on the Keys of the Bahamas, and the slaves on board forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities; and if no compensation has been made, the reasons why it has not been made, with a copy of the correspondence between the two Governments, which has taken place since the answer to a former call on the same subject by the Senate.

Several bills from the House were read twice, and referred to appropriate committees.

The amendments of the House to the bill to renew the patent of Thomas Blanchard, were considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the following bills were severally taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and, after brief explanations from Mr. S., were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill supplementary to the acts "to provide for the organization of the Department of Indian Affairs," and "to regulate the trade and intercourse with Indian tribes;" and

The bill to authorize the appointment of three additional clerks in the Indian bureau.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of John J. Bulow was taken up, and, after some remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD, NORVELL, CLAY of Alabama, and STRANGE, was postponed to Monday next.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the bill to reorganize the district courts of the State of Mississippi, was taken up, and, after being amended, on motion of Mr. W., was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. KNIGHT, the Senate took up the bill to allow a drawback on foreign hemp, when manufactured into cordage and exported.

Mr. BENTON opposed the bill on the ground that the drawback system ought not to be extended on articles that had changed their form by being manufactured, and because the system was productive of the greatest abuses. He objected, also, to the bill on the ground that hemp was extensively manufactured in the country, and carried from the West to the North and East, and that the bill would, therefore, interfere with our own staple.

Mr. KNIGHT made some remarks in favor of the bill.

After some further observations from Messrs. BENTON, HUBBARD, CLAY of Kentucky, CALHOUN, and WRIGHT, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After a short executive session,

On motion of Mr. NILES, the bill for the relief of Jabez S. White and Asa White was taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. NILES, and SMITH of Indiana, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. YOUNG moved to take up the bill to grant the State of Indiana a certain quantity of land, to aid in the construction of certain railroads, for the purpose of making it the special order for Wednesday next; which was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of the owners of the ship Alleghany and cargo was taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD, KING, CLAY of Alabama, and BAYARD,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 1, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read, Mr. CHAMBERS moved that the House take up the following resolution, submitted by Mr. NAYLOR on Monday last:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish this House with copies of the charges of inhuman, unofficerlike, ungentlemanly, and infamous conduct, preferred by Charles E. Barton, a Passed Midshipman of the United States Navy, against Captain Jesse D. Elliott, whilst in command of the Mediterranean squadron, together with all communications in relation to said conduct of said Captain Elliott, and to said charges, on file in the Navy Department, and to communicate the reasons, if any, why the said Elliott has not been ordered to be tried upon said charges.

Mr. C. said this was an important matter, vitally affecting the character of the Navy and the nation, as well as the present Administration, and he was not willing that such conduct as was here alleged should pass unnoticed, and he wanted to know why it was thus shielded.

Mr. INGHAM was one of those who objected to the resolution yesterday, but he did so merely on the ground of the language made use of in it. If the mover would strike out the expressions "inhuman, infamous," &c., Mr. I. would withdraw his objection.

After some further conversation between the above gentlemen and Messrs. MALLORY, ADAMS, and NAYLOR, the resolution was taken up.

Mr. NAYLOR, at the suggestion of Mr. INGHAM, struck out all the epithets between the words "charges" and "preferred," explaining that the language was not his, but the words of the original charge.

DOCUMENTARY HISTORY.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked leave to submit a joint resolution authorizing the further distribution of the Documentary History of the Revolution.

Objection being made, Mr. P. moved a suspension of the rules; upon which motion

Mr. CONNOR asked for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and the rules were suspended—104 to 29.

The resolution having been read twice,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved its engrossment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to strike from it all that related to the disposition of forthcoming volumes. The first volume was paid for, and so far as the distribution of that volume went, he had no objection; but there he would stop.

Mr. ADAMS remarked that that would be equivalent to a repeal of the law.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that that was his object, and this was the only mode of reaching it. He would not do injustice to Clarke & Force, but pay them for their contract, or have the work continued under the direction of persons to be appointed by Congress, and not permit the publishers to select the documents to be reprinted, and to be the sole judges of the extent to which it should go. The clause he proposed to strike out involved an appropriation of upwards of half a million of dollars.

Mr. BIDDLE said he was not prepared to pledge the faith of the House to the performance of this work without a little further consideration, and, therefore, he moved to lay the resolution on the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. THOMAS, who moved to refer the subject to a select committee.

This motion was debated for some time between Messrs. THOMAS, PETRIKIN, and POPE, the last of whom supported Mr. CAMBRELENG's motion, when

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved the following instructions:

With instructions to inquire into the power of Congress to repeal the law under which the work is authorized and contracted to be published; and if, in the opinion of the committee, Congress has the power to repeal the law, to report a bill for that purpose, first making a fair compensation to the undertakers of the work for their loss in the Government not complying with its engagements and contract; and if Congress has not the power to repeal the law, to direct that the work shall be otherwise disposed of, instead of giving the same to members of Congress.

Mr. LOOMIS moved to strike therefrom the words: "instead of giving the same to members of Congress."

Mr. PETRIKIN said he had no idea of occupying the whole day with this resolution; and, therefore, he demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 93, noes 54.

On the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

munication from the Secretary of the Treasury in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th January, showing the amount of money which had been expended in the construction of the custom-house at New York, and the amount which will be necessary to complete the same.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th ultimo, inclosing a report of the Paymaster General, giving information in relation to the troops called into the service of the United States, in the Cherokee country, and the amount remaining unpaid, &c., for said service.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th January, inclosing a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, accompanying certain documents giving information in relation to the payment of annuities to the Seneca Indians in the years 1837 and 1838, and the expenditure of certain appropriations.

Which several communications were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 2, 1839.

Mr. FULTON presented the petition of sundry citizens of Arkansas, praying for the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of General Augustus Jones, asking for the confirmation to the town of Potosi of certain tracts of land, and protesting against the confirmation of the same to John Perry, who claims the same; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial signed by a number of cordwainers, of the city of Washington, remonstrating against the use which has been made of the convicts in the penitentiary, which they consider highly injurious to their interests; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial signed by sundry ship-owners, ship-masters, merchants and traders, interested in the trade of the city of Philadelphia, praying for an appropriation for making an artificial harbor at the mouth of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LINN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Eslava; which was read twice and referred.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the House for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Thomas Glascock, deceased, reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. MORRIS, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of the widow of George Hood, William Lefever, William Tufts, Abner Mitchell, Benjamin Morehouse, and Simon Crusy.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Eslava, reported the same without amendment.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

A bill to allow a drawback of duties on foreign hemp, when manufactured into cordage and exported;

A bill for the relief of Jabez L. White and Asa White;

A bill supplementary to the acts entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the department of Indian affairs," and "An act to regulate the trade and intercourse with Indian tribes;"

A bill to authorize the appointment of three additional clerks in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs;

A bill to amend the act to reorganize the district courts of the United States for the district of Mississippi;

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the bill to prevent the abatement of suits in which the Bank of Columbia is a party, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill for the relief of the securities of Elias B. Langham, late surveyor general for the States of Missouri and Illinois, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills were also severally taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

A bill to authorize the issuing of a patent to the heirs and legal representatives of Francis Rivaud, deceased;

A bill for the relief of the assignees of Louis Baron de Ferrier;

A bill for the relief of Sebastian Butcher and the heirs and legal representatives of Bartholomew Butcher, Michael Butcher, and Peter Bloom;

A bill for the relief of Obed P. Lacy;

After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 2, 1839.

The SPEAKER announced the business in order to be the motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG to correct a statement of the Indian bureau appended to his report on the state of the finances.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. BIDDLE to recommit the report for the general purposes of correction in the report itself.

Mr. PETRIKIN obtained the floor, and remarked that this matter could as well be debated in Committee of the Whole, under the general appropriation bill, as on this incidental motion; and therefore he demanded the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. BIDDLE, who, in reply to Mr. PICKENS's remarks a few days since, disclaimed for himself, in reference to what Mr. P. had said about the tariff question, any knowledge of the existence of any compact or understanding or concert to bring about a renewal of the protective laws. He reluctantly, under his pledge, renewed the motion for the previous question.

Mr. PETRIKIN, however, again withdrew it at the request of Mr. RHETT, who replied to Mr. BIDDLE's remarks the other day, and advocated the principles of the report at considerable length. [Mr. R.'s remarks will be given in full as soon as they are prepared.] He renewed the motion for the previous question, but requested the original mover to withdraw it.

Mr. PETRIKIN insisted; but the House refused to second it.

Mr. BRIGGS then spoke for some time in reply, and, without concluding, gave way to the orders of the day.

Mr. BIDDLE moved that the discussion be continued.

Mr. ADAMS hoped not; for if it was, they would assuredly not pass the bills ordered to be engrossed yesterday.

The motion was lost by a large majority.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, on leave, laid on the table an amendment he intended to propose to the Army bill; which was ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER stated that he had received a letter from Charles J. Ingersoll, with a request that it be laid before the House; and the Speaker asked the House if he should present it now; but it was objected to.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills upon the Speaker's table were read the third time and passed:

An act for the relief of Susan Gratiot, administratrix of Charles H. Gratiot.

The bill for the relief of Roger Jones, Adjutant General of the Army of the United States, was then taken up; and after a debate upon the merits of the same, in which Messrs. MERCER, McKAY, and BOULDIN, advocated its passage, and Mr. RUSSELL opposed it, the latter gentleman moved to postpone its further consideration until Saturday next.

Mr. HOWARD moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. CUSHMAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the main question; and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the title of the bill was so amended as to read as follows: "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers of the Army.'"

The House then took up and passed the following bills:

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the votes by which the bills entitled "An act for the relief of Jamison and Williamson," and "An act for the relief of Cornelius Taylor," were passed, and to postpone the question on their reconsideration until Friday next; which motion the House agreed to.

The House then took up for consideration the bill for the relief of James P. Carlton, which had been postponed until this day; and after a debate in which Messrs. RUSSELL and REED opposed, and Messrs. THOMAS and PETRIKIN advocated, the passage of the same,

Mr. REED moved to recommit it to the committee that reported it, with instructions to report the facts of the case to the House.

A further debate ensued, in which Messrs. SIBLEY, CHAMBERS, and REED spoke in favor of the motion to recommit, and Messrs. CORWIN and HAMER advocated the passage of the bill; and after several divisions on motions to adjourn, and finally to recommit, the House found itself without a quorum; and

On motion of Mr. HALL, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 4, 1839.

Mr. McKEAN presented the petition and documents of A. & G. Ralston & Co., of Philadelphia, praying to be refunded certain duties paid on railroad iron; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of that State, on the subject of a canal around the falls of Ohio, on the Indiana side; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. S. also presented a joint resolution of that State, relative to the construction of the Cumberland road; which was laid on the table, the subject having passed from the Senate.

Mr. S. also presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Indiana, on the subject of a grant of lands to support an institution in that State for the education of the deaf and dumb; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NORVELL presented two memorials from sundry citizens of Michigan, and one from citizens of Chicago, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Port Sheldon. Also, the report of the civil engineer who examined and surveyed said harbor; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of sundry merchants of New York, praying that a law may be passed compelling the Government to pay the costs in suits to which the Government is a party, and which may be decided against it; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of Philip Kearney, presenting a plan for a system of finance. Mr. W. said the memorialist was an intelligent and respectable merchant of New York, who entertained great confidence in the importance and utility of his system, but that he (Mr. W.) dissented altogether from the conclusions to which the memorialist had arrived; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the State of Illinois, asking for the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. Y. also presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois, asking for the passage of a law to establish a permanent system of preemption rights for actual settlers on the public lands; also, for the passage of a law providing for the sale of the public lands in small quantities to actual settlers; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the memorial of the Stockbridge tribe of Indians, praying to be compensated for certain losses; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of Joseph Loranger, asking compensation for property lost or destroyed during the war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROANE presented the memorial of the Common Council of the town of Alexandria, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROANE also presented the petition of the heirs of Thomas West, late of the revolutionary army, praying for the commutation due the deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. STRANGE presented certain resolutions adopted by the Legislature of North Carolina, representing the scarcity of specie change in that State, and asking for the passage of a law authorizing the branch mints to coin silver change.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, wished to make a single observation on the subject, before it was passed over. This complaint of the want of silver change was not confined to North Carolina, but existed in other places, and was produced by that disproportionate value between gold and silver coin which originated in the celebrated gold bill. The effect of this bill was this: that when it became necessary to export specie, silver was exported in preference to gold, because the silver was more valuable in foreign countries, and hence, he apprehended, was the scarcity in North Carolina. He had lately received a communication on this subject from one of our commercial northern cities, which attributed the scarcity of silver change to this cause.

Mr. STRANGE said that when he offered the resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, he had not the slightest expectation that they would have given rise to any debate; but as the Senator from Kentucky had thought proper to notice them, for the purpose of introducing notions on the subject of the currency, he felt it due to himself and his constituents, from whom these resolutions emanated, to make a brief reply. He wholly dissented from the position laid down by the Senator from Kentucky, with regard to the causes which produced a scarcity of silver change. It was not exportation which produced this scarcity, but it arose from the hoarding of silver by the banks, who issued, in lieu of it, their small notes. In fact, he did not believe that silver coins of the lower denominations were ever exported.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, hoped he might be permitted, without offense, to make a few observations on the subject presented by these resolutions, particularly as it was one of importance, to which his attention had been recently directed. He happened to receive, but a very few days ago, a communication from an intelligent gentleman, in one of our principal seaports, affirming that the scarcity of silver change was one of the effects of the passage of the gold bill; because, by reducing the standard of the gold coin, it became less valuable as an article of exportation than silver, and, therefore, the latter was always exported. Now this was exactly what was predicted by himself and others, at the time of the passage of the law, for the adjustment of the value of the two coins; and the result has proved the correctness of the prediction. Gold could not be exported under that law, without disadvantage, unless exchange was greatly against us; but silver can profitably be exported, and when exportation becomes necessary, it is of course made in that species of coin in which it can be sent abroad without loss. This was exactly in accordance with the information which he had just received from an intelligent source, in one of our large commercial cities.

Mr. NILES thought the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was mistaken in the causes to which he had attributed the scarcity of silver change, and that he was mistaken in the fact that a scarcity of change existed in the country at large. He thought there was no such scarcity; he knew, in many places, it was abundant. Within his own experience, banks had refused to receive it. This was a convincing proof that there was abundance of it. It is known to every one who has inquired into this subject, that silver change is never exported, because its nominal value in a foreign market would be lost, and it could only be disposed of as bullion to be re-coined, occasioning much loss by the process. There may be a scarcity of change in some States, but this is the result of their paper systems. The hostility of paper to silver is well known; indeed, so hostile is it, that where it has the power even silver fippenybits are driven out of circulation. What was the result in Philadelphia, where the Mint was located, during the late suspension? In that city, which, previous to the suspension, was thoroughly saturated with silver change, after the barrier was broken down, and the emission of shinplasters authorized, no change whatever could be procured. In a single night, the state of things was completely changed. Instead of an abundance of silver change, there was an entire absence of it. And a similar result will always follow a similar cause; and to the extension of our paper system, the circulation of one dollar notes and notes for a fractional part of a dollar may we much more appropriately look for the scarcity of silver change than the operations of the gold bill of 1836.

Mr. STRANGE said that, upon reflection, he was entirely satisfied that the Senator from Kentucky was grossly mistaken in the positions laid down by him. Every man knew that there had been a great increase of specie in the country, since the passage of the gold bill. Now this increase could not be altogether in gold, but must be partly in silver and partly in gold. He was also satisfied that there could not be the difference in value, between the gold and silver coinage, which the Senator from Kentucky supposed, for he believed that their relative value was as nicely adjusted as it was possible for human ingenuity to do it; indeed this was shown to be the case by the prices current in foreign countries.
